Contract — Penalty — Enforceability — Defendant overstaying permitted period of free parking in car park managed by claimant — £85 charge imposed on defendant — Whether penal — Ambit of common law rule that contractual penalty clause unenforceable — Whether rule to be abolished, restricted or extended — Whether charge enforceable

E

In the first case, following extensive negotiations in which both sides were represented by highly experienced commercial lawyers, the defendant agreed to sell to the claimant a controlling interest in the advertising and marketing company which he had founded. The claimant agreed to pay up to $147m, depending on a calculation of profits, in instalments, with a large amount reflecting goodwill. The agreement provided that for a period after the sale the defendant was not to compete with his old business and that, if he did, he would not be entitled to any further payments (clause 5.1) and the claimant would acquire an option to buy his remaining shares at a price which disregarded goodwill (clause 5.6). When the defendant breached the non-competition provision, the claimant sought a declaration that he was not entitled to further payments and was obliged to sell his shares to it. The judge, rejecting the defendant's contention that clauses 5.1 and 5.6 were penal and therefore unenforceable, made the declarations sought. The Court of Appeal allowed the defendant's appeal, holding that the clauses were not genuine pre-estimates of loss but rather their function was to act as a deterrent, and that, therefore, both clauses were unenforceable penalties. The claimant appealed, contending that the clauses were not penal and that, in any event, the common law rule that contractual penalty clauses were unenforceable should be abolished or at least restricted so as not to apply to commercial transactions where the parties were of equal bargaining power and each acted on skilled legal advice.

G

In the second case, the defendant parked his car in a privately-owned shopping centre car park which was managed by the claimant. Notices prominently displayed at the entrance and throughout the car park stipulated that the maximum permitted stay was two hours, that parking was free up to that time but that £85 would be charged to those who stayed longer, reducible to £50 if paid within 14 days. The

H

- A defendant drove out of the car park nearly an hour after the permitted time and was charged £85 by the claimant, which he did not pay. The claimant brought proceedings in the county court to recover the charge. The judge gave judgment for the claimant, rejecting the defendant's argument that he should not have to pay the charge because (i) it was unenforceable at common law because it was a penalty, and/or (ii) it was unfair and, therefore, unenforceable by virtue of regulation 8 of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999¹. The Court of Appeal dismissed the defendant's appeal. The defendant appealed.

B On the appeals—

- C Held, (1) that the common law rule that a term in a contract which constituted a penalty was unenforceable should not be abolished or restricted, since it was a long-standing principle of English law, common to almost all major systems of law, and had a useful role to play in protecting people against some categories of oppressive bargain which were not subject to statutory regulation; but that the rule should not be extended to cover clauses which imposed onerous obligations on a party on certain contingencies which did not involve a breach of contract, since the courts had no power at common law to regulate the parties' primary obligations; that the rule applied not only to provisions requiring the payment of money on breach of contract but also to clauses providing for the withholding of payments or the transfer of property; that a provision was penal if it was a secondary obligation which imposed a detriment on the contract-breaker out of all proportion to any legitimate interest of the innocent party in the enforcement of the primary obligation; that, therefore, the fact that a provision did not provide for a pre-estimate of loss, or that it was deterrent, did not necessarily mean that it was penal, since the legitimate interest of the innocent party might extend well beyond the recovery of compensation for his loss; and that, in a negotiated contract between properly advised parties of comparable bargaining power, the strong initial presumption had to be that the parties themselves were the best judges of what was legitimate in a provision dealing with the consequences of breach (post, paras 9, 12–13, 16, 28, 31–32, 34–35, 36–43, 129, 143, 145–152, 162–170, 218, 222–226, 228, 230, 233, 239, 241–244, 247–249, 255–256, 261–267, 291, 292–293).

- E Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, HL(Sc), Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, HL(E), Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026, CA and Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401, CA considered.

- F Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205 not applied.

- G (2) Allowing the appeal in the first case, that, although clauses 5.1 and 5.6 had no relationship with the measure of loss attributable to the breach, the claimant had a legitimate interest in the observance of the non-competition provisions which extended beyond the recovery of that loss, since the goodwill of the business was critical to its value and the loyalty of the defendant was critical to that goodwill; that the parties, who were, on both sides, sophisticated, successful and experienced commercial people bargaining on equal terms over a long period with expert legal advice, were the best judges of the degree to which each of them should recognise the proper commercial interests of the other; and that, accordingly, the judge had been right to conclude that clauses 5.1 and 5.6 were enforceable (post, paras 73, 74, 75, 78, 81–83, 88, 115, 172, 180–181, 185, 187, 214, 215, 218, 215, 270–283, 290, 291, 293).

- H AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170 applied.

Reg 6: see post, para 202.

Reg 8(1): see post, para 200.

Sch 2, para 1(e): see post, para 103.

(3) Per Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC, Lord Clarke of Stone-cum-Ebony, Lord Sumption, Lord Carnwath, Lord Toulson and Lord Hodge JJSC, that the defendant in the second case had had a contractual licence to park in the car park on the terms of the notice posted at the entrance, which he had accepted by entering the site; that the £85 charge for contravening the terms of the licence by overstaying the two-hour limit engaged the penalty rule; that, although neither the owners of the car park nor the claimant could have expected to suffer £85 worth of loss if a driver overstayed the two-hour limit, they both had a legitimate interest in the efficient use of the parking spaces for the benefit of other users of the shopping centre which could only be served by deterring drivers from occupying parking spaces for long periods of time; and that, accordingly, since the charge was no greater than was necessary to achieve that result and was not unreasonable by comparison with charges made for overstaying in local authority parking facilities, the charge imposed on the defendant was not a penalty at common law (post, paras 94, 97–101, 115, 188–189, 193, 197–199, 214, 215, 284–288, 290, 291).

(4) Dismissing the appeal in the second case (Lord Toulson JSC dissenting), that, although the charge might fall under the description of potentially unfair terms at paragraph 1(e) of Schedule 2 to the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, it did not come within the basic test for unfairness in regulations 5(1) and 6(1); that any imbalance in the parties' rights did not arise contrary to the requirements of good faith, since the claimant and the owners had a legitimate interest in inducing the defendant not to overstay in order to enable other members of the public to use the available parking space, the charge was no higher than was necessary to achieve that objective, and the defendant had been well aware of the two-hour limit and could reasonably have been expected to comply with it; and that, accordingly, the charge imposed on the defendant was not unfair and so did not infringe the Regulations (post, paras 97–109, 114, 115, 193, 212–213, 214, 215, 289–290, 291).

Aziz v Caixa d'Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770, ECJ applied.

Per Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC, Lord Clarke of Stone-cum-Ebony, Lord Sumption, Lord Carnwath, Lord Toulson and Lord Hodge JJSC. (i) The classification of terms for the purpose of the penalty rule depends on the substance of the term and not on its form or on the label which the parties have chosen to attach to it (post, paras 15, 258, 291, 292).

(ii) The fact that a sum is paid over by one party to the other party as a deposit, in the sense of some sort of surety for the first party's contractual performance, does not prevent the sum being a penalty, if the second party in due course forfeits the deposit in accordance with the contractual terms, following the first party's breach of contract (post, paras 16, 238, 291, 292).

Per Lord Mance, Lord Clarke of Stone-cum-Ebony, Lord Toulson and Lord Hodge JJSC. A case may raise for consideration both the penalty doctrine and the power of the court to relieve against forfeiture. The two doctrines, both originating in equity, operate at different points and with different effects. Consideration whether a clause is penal occurs necessarily as a preliminary to considering whether it should be enforced, or whether relief should be granted against forfeiture (post, paras 160, 227, 291, 294).

Per Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC, Lord Sumption and Lord Carnwath JJSC. Clauses 5.1 and 5.6 are in reality price adjustment clauses which are among the provisions which determine the parties' primary obligations and, therefore, the penalty rule is not engaged (post, paras 74, 77, 83).

APPEALS from the Court of Appeal

Cavendish Square Holding BV v Makdessi

- H By a claim form the claimant, Cavendish Square Holding BV, brought proceedings against the defendant, Talal El Makdessi, seeking declarations that, under an agreement dated 28 February 2008 for the sale by the defendant to the claimant of shares in an advertising and marketing communications group, the defendant, due to his breach of a non-competition clause in the agreement, was not entitled to further payment as a result of clause 5.1 and was obliged to sell his remaining shares to it pursuant to clause 5.6. On 14 December 2012 Burton J sitting in the Commercial Court gave judgment for the claimant [2012] EWHC 3582 (Comm); [2013] 1 All ER (Comm) 787. A

By an appellant's notice the defendant appealed. On 26 November 2013 the Court of Appeal (Patten, Tomlinson and Christopher Clarke LJJ) [2013] EWCA Civ 1539; [2014] 2 All ER (Comm) 125 allowed the appeal and refused permission to appeal.

Pursuant to permission granted by the Supreme Court (Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC, Lord Reed and Lord Toulson JJSC) on 22 May 2014 the claimant appealed. The issues for the Supreme Court, as set out in the parties' statement of agreed facts and issues, were whether (1) clause 5.1, as a clause entitling the innocent party to a breach of contract by the other party to withhold a payment otherwise due, fell within the law of penalties; (2) clause 5.6, as a clause providing an option to call for the transfer of shares in the event of a breach of contract, fell within the law of penalties; (3) clause 5.1, if it did fall within the law of penalties, was penal; and (4) clause 5.6, if it did fall within the law of penalties, was penal. B

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC.

ParkingEye Ltd v Beavis

By a claim form the claimant, ParkingEye Ltd, claimed against the defendant, Barry Beavis, recovery of a charge of £85 for overstaying the permitted period of free parking in a car park at Riverside Retail Park in Chelmsford. On 19 May 2014 Judge Moloney QC, sitting in the County Court at Chelmsford, rejecting the defence that the charge was an unenforceable penalty and/or an unfair term contrary to the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, gave judgment for the claimant. E

By an appellant's notice the defendant appealed. On 23 April 2015 the Court of Appeal (Moore-Bick, Patten LJJ and Sir Timothy Lloyd) [2015] EWCA Civ 402; [2015] RTR 27 dismissed the appeal but gave the defendant permission to appeal.

The defendant appealed. The issues for the Supreme Court, as set out in the parties' statement of agreed facts and issues, were (1) what the test was for determining whether a term was an unenforceable penalty; (2) whether the test should be uniformly applied to commercial contracts, consumer contracts and contracts which were structured so as not to generate any revenue through performance; (3) whether the relevant term was an unenforceable penalty; and (4) whether the relevant term was unfair and therefore unenforceable by virtue of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999. The Supreme Court granted permission to the Consumers' Association to intervene in the appeal. F

The facts are stated in the judgment of Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC.

Joanna Smith QC, Richard Leiper, James McCreath and Edwin Peel (instructed by Squire Patton Boggs (UK) LLP) for the claimant in the first case. H

The doctrine of penalties as set out in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79 and subsequent authorities should no longer apply in the modern commercial world. A clause which

A operates on breach in an apparently extravagant or in terrorem fashion may have been negotiated on a level playing field between sophisticated and well resourced commercial parties, each side having equal bargaining power and access to high quality legal advice. In such a case there is no objectionable conduct, but rather a negotiated deal designed to regulate the commercial relationship between the parties and provide certainty as to the terms of that relationship.

B There is no good reason, whether juristic or of public policy, for the courts to intervene to overturn such a deal and nothing whatsoever unreasonable in enforcing it. On the contrary, enforcing such a bargain is consistent with the principle of freedom of contract and the importance of certainty and predictability in commercial transactions. The law of penalties is a blatant interference with the fundamental principle that, subject to certain recognised exceptions, commercial parties should be free

C to decide on the terms of their bargain: see Elsley v JG Collins Insurance Agencies Ltd [1978] 2 SCR 916, 937. The courts should be slow to find that it applies: see Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1447. The doctrine also gives rise to remarkable anomalies. If clause 5.1 of the contract between the claimant and the defendant had provided that compliance with the provisions of clause 11 was a pre-condition of the interim and further payments becoming payable, it could not be penal since

D it would not be triggered by breach (see Export Credits Guarantee Department v Universal Oil Products Co [1983] 1 WLR 399 and Edgeworth Capital (Luxembourg) SARL v Ramblas Investments BV [2016] 1 All ER (Comm) 368, para 59), even though its commercial effect would have been precisely the same. Thus drafting form triumphs over commercial substance. While that anomaly could be overcome by invoking the concept

E of a disguised penalty (see Office of Fair Trading v Abbey National plc [2010] 1 AC 696, para 83 and Interfoto Picture Library Ltd v Stiletto Visual Programmes Ltd [1989] QB 433, 439) or by broadening the scope of the law of penalties, as in Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205, that would only create further uncertainty over the circumstances in which the law of penalties is engaged. There is a tension between the speeches of Lord Dunedin and Lord Parker of

F Waddington in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79. The use of presumptions gives rise to difficulties; the propositions require further elaboration; and they give rise to confusion as to whether the estimate contemplated is an estimate of the loss which the innocent party will probably suffer or of the loss which he may suffer. In any event, the decision in the Dunlop case has been misunderstood—the traditional test elaborated by Lord Dunedin and

G subsequently followed by the lower courts for over a century did not in fact govern the outcome of the case which was instead decided on the back of commercial considerations as identified in the speech of Lord Atkinson. Accordingly, the law of penalties is plainly deficient and out of step: it is uncertain when and how it applies; it leads to arbitrary and capricious differences in treatment; it undermines the freely agreed bargains of sophisticated commercial parties; and it lacks any coherent rationale by

H which those results can be explained to commercial parties in a satisfactory manner.

The authorities recognise the difficulties in justifying the doctrine: see Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1446; Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 626 and AMEV-UDC Finance

Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170, 183. The rationale for the doctrine must lie in policy, but none of the various policy justifications advanced for the doctrine is convincing in its application to such a commercial case. The compensation principle cannot provide a principled rationale for the law against penalties. First, it is not the rationale which appears in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79, 91–92 and nor did that case apply any such principle. Second, the proposition inherent in the theory that the court is sovereign with regard to the consequences of a breach of contract is not supportable. The principle of freedom of contract and the importance of commercial certainty apply generally, and there is no sound basis whatsoever to limit them only to clauses dealing with primary obligations. Since all contractual obligations are voluntarily undertaken, the principles governing common law liability for damages for breach of such obligations should be founded on the intention of the parties: see Transfield Shipping Inc v Mercator Shipping Inc (The Achilles) [2009] AC 61, para 12 and Bunge SA v Nidera BV (formerly Nidera Handelscompagnie BV) [2015] Bus LR 987, paras 25–27. If the parties are to be free to agree their primary obligations, they should be free to agree the consequences of breach of those obligations. Likewise, if certainty that the court will enforce primary obligations is important, so too is certainty over secondary obligations: see Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41, 59. The beneficiary of a penalty clause may well have granted a premium or given concessions in other parts of the contract to secure it, and it is manifestly unfair on them for only those concessions to be enforced. The courts do not apply the so-called compensatory principle in other contexts where the parties depart from it by agreement. Likewise, if a liquidated damages clause provides for a payment less than the wronged party’s actual loss, the court has no jurisdiction to award him a sum commensurate with that loss. Conversely, if the parties expressly agree that a defendant will be liable for all of the actual loss occasioned by the breach, whatever that loss may be, it does not matter if the defendant did not have knowledge of special circumstances which would otherwise have been necessary if the damages were not to be too remote at common law: see Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1448. It is not sufficient for a clause to be condemned as penal to show that the sum which it provides to be paid on breach is greater than the common law damages which would be awarded: see Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401, para 15 and Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946, paras 110–111. Third, although its substantive effect is to provide compensation, that is not how the compensatory principle is in fact formulated. Rather, its formulation indicates that its intention is to replicate contractual performance in money terms. A principle designed to replicate contractual performance is not apt to justify a jurisdiction to relieve a party of performing other provisions of the contract.

It is necessary, therefore, to turn to public policy to find a rationale for departing from the principle of freedom of contract and the desirability of certainty: see Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 622; Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1446 and Euro London Appointments Ltd v Claessens International Ltd [2006] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 436, para 16. The rationale involves the notion that there is something inherently wrong about a bargain which falls foul of the doctrine: see

- A Interstar Wholesale Finance Pty Ltd v Integral Home Loans Pty Ltd [2008] NSWCA 310 at [159]. However, generally speaking, the courts of equity have never interfered with contracts merely because they were improvident: see Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 QB 476, 495. The authorities suggest three potential policy justifications. The first is the protection of contracting parties against extravagant and unconscionable or oppressive behaviour: see
- B Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, 10. That provides no good justification for the doctrine in such a commercial case. On the contrary, any unconscionability lies in the defendant's attempts to avoid those parts of the bargain he freely signed up to which he does not like while retaining those he does. In any event, it is a justification which gives rise to incoherency in the law, since there is no jurisdiction to grant relief from other types of clauses which might be
- C regarded as extravagant or unconscionable. The simple fact that the court may regard a party as having made a bad bargain is no ground for intervention. The concepts of extravagance and unconscionability are inherently ambiguous and their application dependent on the subjective view of the tribunal; as such their deployment in a commercial case leads to a degree of uncertainty for which there is no countervailing advantage. The second justification is that there is something objectionable about clauses
- D designed with a purpose to deter a breach of contract: see Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752, 762. However, there is nothing objectionable about commercial parties agreeing to a clause which acts as a deterrent and that clause being enforced. On the contrary, there are perfectly sound reasons why the parties may wish to deter a party from breaching the contract and why that agreement should be enforced: the
- E parties are best placed to decide what value they wish to place on performance, and the value they agree to place on it will form part of the overall contractual bargain, being reflected in concessions made elsewhere: see 869163 Ontario Ltd v Torrey Springs II Associates Ltd (2005) 256 DLR (4th) 490, para 34. It is difficult to see how the clause in the Dunlop
- F case [1915] AC 79 was not designed to deter a breach of the relevant obligation—its whole purpose appears to have been to deter a breach of the price maintenance agreement: see p 92 and Mortgage Makers v McKeen (2009) 312 DLR (4th) 82, paras 22–23. The third potential justification is that penalties are economically inefficient. Such arguments are at best inconclusive, and there are clear inefficiencies in not enforcing penalty clauses. Litigation over penalties is itself inefficient. Further, it is desirable economically that such stipulations should be enforced since the parties
- G themselves are in the best position to determine the value of performance. The various policy candidates are deficient on their own terms, and that deficiency is only highlighted by comparing them with the strength of the rationale in other areas where the courts restrict freedom of contract for policy reasons: (1) the public policy against illegality which is concerned with the public interest in not having the courts lend their support to illegal
- H conduct or reaching decisions which would be inconsistent with the criminal law; and (2) the public policy behind other forms of both common law and statutory control which are aimed at protecting those who have not enjoyed freedom of contract, e.g duress, undue influence, unfair terms legislation. A detailed analysis of the origins and history of the doctrine of penalties is of marginal assistance since, contrary to the approach of the High Court of

Australia in Andrews 247 CLR 205, the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 was intended to be and was a definitive statement of the law and is the source of the modern doctrine: see Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong 61 BLR 41, 56 and AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin 162 CLR 170, 190.

The court should depart from the decision in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 on the basis that there are cogent reasons for so doing: see Rees v Darlington Memorial Hospital NHS Trust [2004] 1 AC 309, para 31. Legal rules resting upon public policy can and should be modified by the courts as policy considerations change, or if the court considers that the policy considerations which motivated those rules are not sound. There are no good policy reasons which support the application of the doctrine of penalties generally in such a commercial case. On the contrary, there are overwhelming reasons in both principle and policy why it should not normally apply. In any event, there is power to depart from the Dunlop case in order to promote the certainty of the law: see R v National Insurance Comr, Ex p Hudson [1972] AC 944, 966. Accordingly, the court should hold that the doctrine has no role to play in and should no longer apply to such a commercial case. The policy considerations underlying the doctrine may justify its application in a case where the terms are genuinely oppressive, providing protection to the weaker contracting party in a consumer context, or in an ordinary employment case, or in a commercial context where one party has significantly greater bargaining power than the other. There may also be a justification for intervention in circumstances where it is possible to state that the object of the transaction in question, and the insertion of the clause said to be penal, is essentially to secure the payment of a sum of money. In those circumstances, it could be said that providing instead that that sum of money and interest be paid is sufficient to satisfy the parties' intentions. In such a case, there is no abrogation from the principle of freedom of contract. Such an approach would be consistent with the historical origins of the doctrine of relief from penalties and the closely analogous doctrine of relief from forfeiture (see Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 722) and is justified because on receiving payment of the money in question, the promisee can be said to have received all that he bargained for, on the agreement properly understood: see Çukurova Finance International Ltd v Alfa Telecom Turkey Ltd (Nos 3 to 4) [2016] AC 923. Even that jurisdiction is to be exercised carefully in a commercial case: see BICC plc v Burndy Corpn [1985] Ch 232, 252. Such an approach however can have no application to a clause providing for a sum of money to be payable on breach in more complex transactions with objects beyond the payment of money, or to transactions involving non-monetary obligations. The court should not follow the approach of the High Court of Australia in the Andrews case 247 CLR 205. The court there wrongly distinguished between the law of penalties at common law and in equity. The decision greatly expands the scope of the law of penalties in a fashion inimical to freedom of contract, is out of step with legislative developments, and fails to articulate any policy underlying the expansion of the role beyond its previously understood scope. More assistance can be found in AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin 162 CLR 170, 193–194 in which the rationale for the doctrine of penalties was stated to be the protection of weak contracting parties. That rationale for the doctrine leaves no room for its application in such a commercial case.

- A Alternatively, the doctrine of penalties should only be applied to clauses requiring the payment of a sum of money on breach. Clauses such as clause 5.1, which disentitle the contract breaker from receiving a sum which would otherwise be due to him, and clause 5.6, which require a transfer of property from the contract breaker, should not be subject to examination to establish whether they are penal. Since the rationale for the doctrine of
- B penalties is unclear, the court should keep it within narrow constraints, not extend it: see Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong 61 BLR 41, 55, 59 and Else (1982) Ltd v Parkland Holdings Ltd [1994] 1 BCLC 130, 138. The Court of Appeal was bound to hold that a clause disentitling the contract breaker from receiving a sum which would otherwise be due to him was subject to the law of penalties by Socony Mobil Oil Co Inc v West of England Ship Owners Mutual Insurance Association (London) Ltd (The Padre Island) (No 2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 529, which followed what it took to be the decision in Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd v Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd [1974] AC 689. The decision in The Padre Island (No 2) was wrong and should be overruled. The relevant comments in the Gilbert-Ash case were obiter and not the subject of argument, and accordingly take matters no further. The Court of Appeal was wrong to
- D hold that a clause providing for the transfer of shares in the event of breach fell within the law of penalties. First, the present case is distinguishable from Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 since it operates on breach of a clause included in the contract in order to protect the goodwill, the value of which formed a major part of the consideration, and whose function was to sever the relationship between the parties. Second, there is no rationale for extending the doctrine of penalties beyond its original formulation in Dunlop [1915] AC 79. The anomalies in relation to the doctrine apply with equal force where the clause is an option. If the trigger for the option had been anything other than breach—even had it been something arbitrary and without commercial rationale—there would have been no basis for the court to intervene. There is no good reason why the fact that the parties chose
- E breach as the trigger for the option should permit such intervention. Third, the clause in Jobson's case was and ought properly to have been regarded as a forfeiture clause, and if it were regarded as such the case for relief would be strong. Forfeiture clauses and penalty clauses are distinct and subject to distinct rules, and should remain so. [Reference was also made to Daff v Midland Colliery Owners' Mutual Indemnity Co Ltd (1913) 109 LT 418.]
- G Alternatively, clauses 5.1 and 5.6 had a genuine commercial purpose other than deterrence, and as such should be enforced. There was nothing extravagant or unconscionable about either clause. When considered together it is even more apparent that the predominant purpose of clauses 5.1 and 5.6 was not to deter breach. They simply entitled the claimant to buy the defendant's shares on a different basis in the event of a breach. In finding that the alternative basis allowed for by clause 5.1 and 5.6 was a
- H penalty, the Court of Appeal declared unenforceable an agreement between two sophisticated commercial entities, with the full benefit of legal advice, to buy a different business at a different price, which is precisely the result the courts should strive to avoid in any application of the rule against penalties: see Wallis v Smith (1882) 21 Ch D 243, 266.

Michael Bloch QC and Camilla Bingham QC (instructed by Clifford Chance LLP) for the defendant in the first case. A

The existing law on penalties is sound in principle and has proved sound in practice. It has been applied consistently and without difficulty for more than a century. There is no case for any reform by judicial legislation; far less for the claimant's suggested reform. The court does not enforce clauses which provide for extortionate, extravagant, exorbitant or unconscionable penalties because such clauses offend the compensatory principle of damages which underpins the court's approach to monetary remedies: see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, 101, 105; Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, 17 and Craig v M'Beath (1863) 1 M 1020, 1022. The penalty rule is a rule of the court's own, produced and maintained for purposes of public policy: see Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 622. In so far as contracting parties legislate for the amount to be paid by way of proper compensation, the court will enforce their bargain. If, however, in purporting to provide for the level of compensation, they have made extravagant and extortionate provision such as the court would not countenance awarding by way of compensation, the court will scale down the provision to a level which approximates to the damages available at law: see Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026, 1041, 1042. It is not anomalous that the court should interfere with penalty clauses while enforcing limitation and exemption clauses. The difference of principle justifying different treatment is that by limitation and exemption clauses parties agree to cap their recovery or not to recover at all in respect of designated losses. It has always been lawful for parties to waive or limit their full legal rights, subject to critical statutory protections. Penalty provisions, by contrast, are provisions by which the parties purport to extend their rights beyond the limits of what the law permits. Their goal is the impermissible goal of punishment as opposed to compensation. B

Although many of the earlier authorities use the language of deterrence in characterising penalty clauses, the doctrine is not predominantly concerned with deterrence nor are the courts implacably hostile to deterrence. In practice deterrence only becomes illegitimate where the penal provision is so extravagant as to dwarf the damages likely to be occasioned by the relevant breach. Nor, where it is established, does the absence of a subjective intention to deter redeem a penalty. The judgment in Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752 was not a call to set aside centuries of legal and equitable jurisprudence, nor has it been interpreted as such in England or in any other common law jurisdiction: see Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401; Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946; In re Mandarin Container [2004] 3 HKLRD 554; Beil v Mansell (No 2) [2006] 2 Qd R 499; PSAL Ltd v Kellas-Sharpe [2012] QSC 31; Elberg v Fraval [2012] VSC 342; Place Concorde East Ltd Partnership v Shelter Corp'n of Canada Ltd (2003) 43 BLR (3d) 54; Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2015] FCAFC 50 at [25], [99]–[101] and Hong Leong Finance Ltd v Tan Gin Huay [1999] 2 SLR 153. In considering extravagance and justification, the court will look at all the circumstances. There may be cases in which it is appropriate to take into account social considerations and objectives, the more so where those objectives are reflected in legislation. Just as clauses in F
H

A commercial contracts which might otherwise be adjudged penal can be redeemed by commercial justification, so too clauses directed at legitimate social objectives can be redeemed by social justification.

Neither a pre-occupation with inequality of bargaining power, nor a desire to protect bargain makers who have not sought legal advice, are anywhere discernible in the English authorities on penalties. To the contrary, the parties' relative negotiating strength is expressly discounted as irrelevant: see Imperial Tobacco Co (of Great Britain and Ireland) Ltd v Parslay [1936] 2 All ER 515, 523. The English common law has abundant means of protecting vulnerable contracting parties against oppressive or unconscionable conduct. For its part Parliament has legislated extensively to protect parties deemed to be at a negotiating disadvantage: see the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977; the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (SI 1999/2083); the Consumer Credit Act 1974, sections 140A–140D, (inserted by the Consumer Credit Act 2006, sections 19–22); the Competition Act 1998; the Employment Rights Act 1996; the Gambling Act 2005, section 336; the Sale of Goods Act 1979, sections 12, 14; the Life Assurance Act 1774 (14 Geo 3, c 48), section 1; the Marine Insurance Act 1906; the Leasehold Reform Act 1967 and the Housing Act 1988, sections 13, 14. The focus of the doctrine of penalties is thus not the protection of the weak from the strong. It is about ensuring that where a primary obligation has been breached, the compensation awarded bears some relation to the breach. Parties are not obliged to measure their prospective damage scientifically. They have considerable latitude in fashioning the remedy and the court is slow to characterise a provision as penal, the more so where a sophisticated contract maker seeks to resile from the clear wording of his bargain: see Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41. The very fact of his sophistication renders it improbable that he has submitted to an extravagant provision. However, where the bespoke remedy is in the court's view extravagant and exorbitant, the innocent party is confined to recovery of his actual losses. There is nothing anachronistic about the law as it stands. Nor is there any unfairness. The taking of legal advice cannot transform an objectionable provision into an unobjectionable one, or vice versa. The test is objective. On the facts, the relevance, if any, of a penalty clause having been negotiated as part of a specific trade-off does not arise. Even if the evidence established that the penalties were part of a package negotiated with sensitivity to their potential impact, that would not affect their penal character: see Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656, para 38. [Reference was made to CRA Ltd v NZ Goldfields Investments [1989] VR 873.]

The case for legal reform has been considered by the Law Commissions of the United Kingdom (Working Paper No 61, Penalty Clauses and Forfeiture of Monies Paid (1975) and Report on Penalty Clauses, Scot Law Com No 171 (1999)), Ontario (Report on Amendment of the Law of Contract (1983), para 41) and Victoria: Discussion Paper No 10, Liquidated Damages and Penalties (1988). The commissions all recognise that judicial supervision of penalty clauses in some form or another is desirable, and none of them recommends an exemption for commercial contracts. The claimant has not identified any changed circumstances or conditions such as, had they been in the contemplation of Lord Dunedin in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79, would or might have led him down a different path—in 1915 the compensatory principle prevailed, the court was the primary arbiter of the consequences of a breach of contract, the court considered that liquidated damages provisions fulfilled a useful function and the court was hostile to attempts to coerce performance under threat of expropriation. Thus there are no changed conditions which render the rule or its rationale suspect. In any event, if the law is to be changed, Parliament is the appropriate body to achieve it.

Clauses 5.1 and 5.6 both fall within, and fall foul of, the doctrine of penalties. There is no difference of substance between the classic penalty clause which obliges the contract breaker to pay the innocent party a sum of money in the event of breach and a withholding clause, such as clause 5.1, which entitles the innocent party to withhold sums which would otherwise have been payable to the contract breaker as consideration. In each case, the innocent party is seeking to coerce performance under threat of extortionate punishment: see The Padre Island (No 2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 529, 626. Despite the arguably obiter character of the relevant dicta, Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd v Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd [1974] AC 689 has been treated as authority for the proposition that withholding provisions fall within the penalty doctrine: see Else (1982) Ltd v Parkland Holdings Ltd [1994] 1 BCLC 130; Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368 and Workers Trust & Merchant Bank Ltd v Dojap Investments Ltd [1993] AC 573. It would also be unprincipled to exclude from the reach of the doctrine clauses like 5.6 which require the transfer of property rather than the payment of money: see Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026, 1034, 1042; Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205 and Amaltal Corp'n Ltd v Maruha (NZ) Corp'n Ltd [2004] 2 NZLR 614. The case for a clear and coherent doctrine which looks to substance and not to form is overwhelming. To the extent, therefore, that there is any doubt as to the existing law, the court should confirm that withholding clauses and clauses requiring a transfer of property upon breach are not exempt from the doctrine. Both clauses fall foul of the penalty doctrine for all the reasons given by the Court of Appeal, applying settled law to facts which were not substantially in dispute. [Reference was made to Forestry Commission of New South Wales v Stefanetto (1976) 133 CLR 507; Wollondilly Shire Council v Picton Power Lines Pty Ltd (1994) 33 NSWLR 551; Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656 and Imam-Sadeque v Bluebay Asset Management (Services) Ltd [2013] IRLR 344.]

Smith QC replied.

John de Waal QC, David Lewis and Ryan Hocking (instructed by Harcus Sinclair UK Ltd) for the defendant in the second case.

The claimant's principal purpose in imposing the parking charge on the defendant was to deter motorists from abusing the facility by staying beyond the period of free parking. The charge is extravagant and unconscionable in comparison with the greatest loss which could conceivably be proved to have followed from the defendant's breach and, therefore, it should not be enforceable: see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79. The source of the doctrine of penalties lies in public policy. The need to protect contracting parties against extravagant and unconscionable behaviour is all the greater in consumer cases, often involving commercially unsophisticated and not well resourced individuals

A who do not negotiate the terms of the contract and who have manifest inequality of bargaining power. There is no reason in principle why a contractual provision, the effect of which is to increase the consideration payable under an executory contract upon the happening of a default, should be struck down as a penalty if the increase could in the circumstances be explained as commercially justifiable, provided always that its dominant purpose is not to deter the other party from breach: see Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752, 763. The predominant function test is sound and does not require abolition or amendment.

B The Court of Appeal was wrong to accept that some clauses which require payment on breach of a sum which cannot be justified as liquidated damages in accordance with established principles should nonetheless be enforceable because they are not extravagant or unconscionable and are justifiable in other terms. The extravagant and unconscionable test is not a stand-alone test. It is anchored in the principle that a clause will be held to be a penalty if the sum stipulated for is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss which could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach: see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, 87. The correct approach is to look at what loss flows from the breach and then consider whether the payment demanded is extravagant and unconscionable. The concept of commercial justification can also not be left to float free of the compensatory principle. The function of the concept of commercial justification is not to justify the imposition of a charge which is otherwise penal but to enable the conclusion that deterrence of breach was not the dominant purpose of the term. In any event, commercial justification should be relevant only to commercial contracts freely negotiated between sophisticated parties, not to consumer contracts where the terms are not individually negotiated. The Court of Appeal also wrongly considered that there was some kind of social justification for the clause, yet did not begin to formulate a test for the circumstances in which a deterrent payment might be carved out as an exception to the general law on penalties. The analogy it made with the charges imposed by local authorities is not apt. Local authorities impose non-negotiable penalties in accordance with their statutory duty, the amount of the penalties being prescribed by statutory instrument: see the Traffic Management Act 2004, section 77, Schedule 9, paragraphs 7, 8 and the Civil Enforcement of Parking Contravention (Guidelines on Levels of Charges) (England) Order 2007 (SI 2007/3487), article 2 and the Schedule. In any event, social justification is not a relevant consideration. Should Parliament perceive a need—presumably with the benefit of extensive inquiry, expert, industry and consumer opinion—to permit private sector traffic management companies to charge deterrent penalties on social policy grounds, it can enact suitable legislation. The Court of Appeal wrongly found support for the proposition that such a charge is not to be regarded as unenforceable in the terms of section 56 of and Schedule 4 to the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012. However, those provisions simply provide the operator with a mechanism for recovering parking charges from the registered keeper of the vehicle, they do not specify that a particular level of charges is appropriate.

Under regulation 8(1) of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, which implement Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts (OJ 1993 L95, p 29), an unfair term in a contract concluded with a consumer by a seller or supplier shall not be binding on the consumer. A contractual term which has not been individually negotiated shall be regarded as unfair if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer: see regulation 5(1). In making an assessment of good faith, particular regard shall be had to the strength of the bargaining position of the parties: see the sixteenth recital of the Preamble to the Directive and Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2002] 1 AC 481, para 17. Schedule 2 to the Regulations sets out the indicative and non-exhaustive list of terms which may be regarded as unfair, which includes a term requiring any consumer who fails to fulfil his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation. Concepts of commercial justification or social justification play no part in the test for unfairness under the Regulations. In order to assess whether a term is contrary to the requirement of good faith it must be determined whether the seller or supplier, dealing fairly and equitably with the consumer, could reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed to that term in individual contract negotiations: see Aziz v Caixa d'Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770, paras 44-45, 67, 69-70. A parking charge which may be demanded of a motorist who overstays by even one minute (or less) is disproportionately high. It bears no relation to the period of overstaying, the benefit the motorist obtains, or the loss the operator suffers. The significant requirement is met by the fact that the motorist assumes the risk of having to pay the parking charge if he overstays by even one minute (or in fact less). The claimant, dealing fairly, could not reasonably assume that a consumer such as the defendant would have agreed to the parking charge in individual contract negotiations.

Christopher Butcher QC (instructed by Kate Wellington) for the intervener.

The Court of Appeal's decision potentially undermines the protection for consumers, not just in the area of parking charges but across a wide spectrum of markets. It could lead to the imposition of excessive default charges justified in the name of a supposed wider good. The existing penalty doctrine should be neither modified nor abolished. The doctrine is clear and long established. Parliament could have intervened to change it but has not done so. Countless agreements have been structured based upon it. There have been no significant judicial calls for its abolition. Any change should be the product of extensive consultation. In any event, there should be no change in relation to consumer contracts. The doctrine provides a significant protection. While issues of inequality of bargaining power may not have been part of the original justification behind the doctrine, there are judicial acknowledgements that its effect in addressing the undesirable results of inequality of bargaining power is one of the reasons for its retention: see Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 629; AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170 and Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41. The fact that there are some other statutory protections for those in weaker bargaining positions does not eliminate the need for the doctrine since, for

A example, the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 do not apply to small businesses or to individually negotiated contracts. It also cannot be assumed that consumer protection legislation would have been identical if there had not been a law as to penalties.

B The claimant's parking charge was an unenforceable penalty since it was a contractual stipulation predominantly designed to deter breach: see Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, 86; Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752; Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401 and Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946. It is not permissible to look at the commercial basis of the parking operation as a whole—which the defendant would not have been aware of—when construing the particular term in the individual contract. Further, the charge was not a genuine pre-estimate of loss. The claimant has suffered no direct financial loss as a result of the defendant's breach of contract.

C The way in which the Court of Appeal reached its decision was novel and highly unsatisfactory. It wrongly took into account wider social considerations and applied a freestanding test of extravagant and unconscionable, rather than the original test of extravagant and unconscionable by comparison with the greatest amount of loss which could be anticipated as a result of the breach. The decision introduces very considerable uncertainty into the law. It is also an approach which potentially permits considerable hardship to be imposed on consumers, without regard to their particular circumstances or ability to pay. Commercial justification should have no relevance, particularly in a consumer situation. Such a justification is not explicit or implicit in the earlier authorities, it does not explain them and it is too uncertain a factor.

D The Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 gives no approval to such a scheme of charging. On the contrary, the Act must and will have been drafted on the assumption that the existing law of penalties applies. The Act does not provide for any statutory modification or restriction of the law of penalties, notwithstanding that the charges may be imposed contractually and that this is an area where local authorities may impose penalties.

E Under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 it is necessary to look at all the terms of the contract. On the facts, there is a significant imbalance between the parties' respective rights and obligations. In assessing imbalance, the Regulations do not provide for regard to be had to any supposed social justification. In order to show that good faith has not been established it is not necessary to show bad faith. The test is whether the party adversely affected by the inclusion of the term might reasonably be expected to object to its inclusion: see Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2002] 1 AC 481, para 54. A term will not be in good faith if it exploits known tendencies on the part of consumers to misjudge how they behave: see Office of Fair Trading v Ashbourne Management Services Ltd [2012] LLR 182.

F Jonathan Kirk QC, David Altaras and Thomas Samuels (instructed by Cubism Law) for the claimant in the second case.

The correct test for a penalty is whether, taking into account all the circumstances at the time of entering into the contract, the term was extravagant and unconscionable. The parking provisions in the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 were designed to permit the use of parking charges, rather than clamping, to deter unauthorised parking on private land. The charge imposed by the claimant was neither extravagant nor unconscionable but was proportionate to the legitimate object sought to be achieved, namely to deter motorists from overstaying the period of two hours' free parking. The term was not unfair within the meaning of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999. It was a simple and familiar provision of which very clear notice was given to the consumer in advance. There is good reason for contractually enforcing a simple fixed payment parking charge which has the dual function of deterring overstaying at a city centre car park, and funding the management of free car parking for consumers. There is a public interest in car parking space on private land being provided and properly managed. Consumers, landowners and retail businesses all benefit.

The amount charged should not be set much higher than is necessary to achieve the objective of deterring breach: see the opinion of Advocate General Kokott in Aziz v Caixa d'Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770. Setting a reasonable amount will depend upon all of the relevant circumstances. The level of the claimant's charge was broadly comparable with those which Parliament considers reasonable to deter motorists from parking badly or overstaying; see the Civil Enforcement of Parking Contravention (Guidelines on Levels of Charges) (England) Order 2007. The courts below were correct to conclude that a charge set at a similar level was reasonably necessary to deter the same conduct in a private city centre car park. In enacting the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012 Parliament encouraged civil car parking enforcement, but balanced that by creating a regulatory framework which protects consumers: see the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008 (SI 2008/1277). The parking charge was neither disproportionate nor extravagant and the defendant was well aware of the terms when he took advantage of the free parking, as he had done before. There was no lack of good faith nor a significant imbalance between the parties' respective rights and obligations.

A fixed payment term which is objectively justifiable and not extravagant and unconscionable should not automatically be considered an unlawful penalty on the basis of a rigid test of whether its predominant function is to deter breach. Justice and fairness are central to the court's assessment. The courts have considered a wide variety of factors in determining whether a contractual term should be struck down on the grounds that it is an unlawful penalty: see Astley v Weldon (1801) 2 Bos & P 346; Kemble v Farren (1829) 6 Bing 141; Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6; Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79; Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752 and Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946. A rigid comparison solely between deterrence and a pre-estimate of recoverable damages does not reflect the rationale of Dunlop [1915] AC 79, where no such comparison was practically possible. If the word "deter" carries its ordinary meaning of discourage or dissuade, it is likely that the term which was upheld in the Dunlop case was designed predominantly to deter breach. Colman J in Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752 sought to break free of that rigid dichotomy by holding that a term which was

A commercially justifiable could be enforced, notwithstanding the absence of a genuine pre-estimate. There is no good reason why justification should be confined to commercial considerations.

The parking charge was not an unfair term. It was imposed in good faith: see Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2002] 1 AC 481, para 17. The material term was expressed fully, clearly, legibly, openly and given appropriate prominence. No advantage was taken of the defendant by way of necessity, indigence, lack of experience or unfamiliarity with the subject matter of the contract. Deterrent parking charges have been encouraged by Parliament within the scheme of the 2012 Act as an acceptable alternative deterrent to clamping. The claimant levied the charges in good faith in light of the provisions of the 2012 Act such that the contract term imposing the charges should be presumed to be fair: see Council Directive 93/13/EEC, thirteenth recital. There was no significant imbalance between the parties' respective rights and obligations because of the overall benefit to the consumer under the contract and the existing statutory and regulatory consumer protection measures. In providing car parking facilities, the claimant was supplying a service of a public nature. A court considering the term ought, therefore, to take account of the interests of all potential users: see the sixteenth recital. It is a familiar characteristic of municipal car parks that a penalty charge is incurred however short the overstay. Given that the defendant had used the car park on previous occasions, the claimant could reasonably have assumed that he would have agreed to the overstay charge in individual contract negotiations: see Aziz v Caixa d'Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770. Paragraph 1 of Schedule 2 to the Regulations sets out terms which may be regarded as unfair but the appearance of a term in that list is merely indicative: see the Aziz case, para 70. All of the circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract must be considered. The relevant question is whether the term is appropriate for securing the attainment of its objectives and does not go beyond what is necessary to achieve them: see the Aziz case, Advocate General's opinion, point 87 and judgment, para 74. In circumstances where Parliament has provided that parking charges may constitute a legitimate deterrent, the charge is not higher than is necessary to prevent overstay.

4 November 2015. The following judgments were handed down.

LORD NEUBERGER OF ABBOTSBURY PSC and LORD SUMPTION JSC
(with whom LORD CARNWATH JSC agreed)

H 1 These two appeals raise an issue which has not been considered by the Supreme Court or by the House of Lords for a century, namely the principles underlying the law relating to contractual penalty clauses, or, as we will call it, the penalty rule. The first appeal, Cavendish Square Holding BV v Makdessi, raises the issue in relation to two clauses in a substantial commercial contract. The second appeal, ParkingEye Ltd v Beavis, raises the issue at a consumer level, and it also raises a separate issue under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (“the 1999 Regulations”).

2 We shall start by addressing the law on the penalty rule generally, and will then discuss the two appeals in turn.

The law in relation to penalties

3 The penalty rule in England is an ancient, haphazardly constructed edifice which has not weathered well, and which in the opinion of some should simply be demolished, and in the opinion of others should be reconstructed and extended. For many years, the courts have struggled to apply standard tests formulated more than a century ago for relatively simple transactions to altogether more complex situations. The application of the rule is often adventitious. The test for distinguishing penal from other principles is unclear. As early as 1801, in Astley v Weldon (1801) 2 Bos & P 346, 350 Lord Eldon CJ confessed himself, not for the first time, “much embarrassed in ascertaining the principle upon which [the rule was] founded”. Eighty years later, in Wallis v Smith (1882) 21 ChD 243, 256, Jessel MR, not a judge noted for confessing ignorance, observed that “The ground of that doctrine I do not know”. In 1966 Diplock LJ, not a judge given to recognising defeat, declared that he could “make no attempt, where so many others have failed, to rationalise this common law rule”: Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1446. The task is no easier today. But unless the rule is to be abolished or substantially extended, its application to any but the clearest cases requires some underlying principle to be identified.

Equitable origins

4 The penalty rule originated in the equitable jurisdiction to relieve from defeasible bonds. These were promises under seal to pay a specified sum of money, subject to a proviso that they should cease to have effect on the satisfaction of a condition, usually performance of some other (“primary”) obligation. By the beginning of the 16th century, the practice had grown up of taking defeasible bonds to secure the performance obligations sounding in damages. This enabled the holder of the bond to bring his action in debt, which made it unnecessary for him to prove his loss and made it possible to stipulate for substantially more than his loss. The common law enforced the bonds according to their letter. But equity regarded the real intention of the parties as being that the bond should stand as security only, and restrained its enforcement at common law on terms that the debtor paid damages, interest and costs. The classic statement of this approach is that of Lord Thurlow LC in Sloman v Walter (1783) 1 Bro CC 418, 419:

“where a penalty is inserted merely to secure the enjoyment of a collateral object, the enjoyment of the object is considered as the principal intent of the deed, and the penalty only as accessional, and, therefore, only to secure the damage really incurred . . .”

5 The essential conditions for the exercise of the jurisdiction were (i) that the penal provision was intended as a security for the recovery of the

A true amount of a debt or damages, and (ii) that that objective could be achieved by restraining proceedings on the bond in the courts of common law, on terms that the defendant paid damages. As Lord Macclesfield LC observed in Peachy v Duke of Somerset (1720) 1 Str 447, 453:

B “The true ground of relief against penalties is from the original intent of the case, where the penalty is designed only to secure money, and the court gives him all that he expected or desired: but it is quite otherwise in the present case. These penalties or forfeitures were never intended by way of compensation, for there can be none.”

C This last reservation remained an important feature of the equitable jurisdiction to relieve. As Baggallay LJ put it in Protector Endowment Loan and Annuity Co v Grice (1880) 5 QB 592, 595, “where the intent is not simply to secure a sum of money, or the enjoyment of a collateral object, equity does not relieve.”

The common law rule

D 6 The process by which the equitable rule was adopted by the common law is traced by Professor Simpson in his article “The Penal Bond with Conditional Defeasance” (1966) 82 LQR 392, 418–419. Towards the end of the 17th century, the courts of common law tentatively began to stay proceedings on a penal bond to secure a debt, unless the plaintiff was willing to accept a tender of the money, together with interest and costs. The rule was regularised and extended by two statutes of 1696 and 1705. Section 8 of the Administration of Justice Act 1696 (8 & 9 Will 3, c 11) is a prolix provision whose effect was that the plaintiff suing in the common law courts on a defeasible bond to secure the performance of covenants (not just debts) E was permitted to plead the breaches and have his actual damages assessed. Judgment was entered on the bond, but execution was stayed on payment of the assessed damages. The Administration of Justice Act 1705 (4 & 5 Anne c 16) allowed the defendant in an action on the bond to pay the amount of the actual loss, together with interest and costs, into court, and rely on the F payment as a defence. These statutes were originally framed as facilities for plaintiffs suing on bonds. But by the end of the 18th century the common law courts had begun to treat the statutory procedures as mandatory, requiring damages to be pleaded and proved and staying all further G proceedings on the bond: see Roles v Rosewell (1794) 5 Durn & E 538, Hardy v Bern (1794) 5 Durn & E 636. The effect of this legislation was thus to make it unnecessary to proceed separately in chancery for relief from the penalty and in the courts of common law for the true loss. As a result, the equitable jurisdiction was rarely invoked, and the further development of the penalty rule was entirely the work of the courts of common law.

H 7 It developed, however, on wholly different lines. The equitable jurisdiction to relieve from penalties had been closely associated with the jurisdiction to relieve from forfeitures which developed at the same time. Both were directed to contractual provisions which on their face created primary obligations, but which during the 17th and 18th centuries the courts of equity treated as secondary obligations on the ground that the real intention was that they should stand as a mere security for performance. The court then intervened to grant relief from the rigours of the secondary obligation in order to secure performance in another, less penal or (in modern language) more proportionate, way. In contrast, the penalty rule as it was developed by the common law courts in the course of the 19th and 20th centuries proceeded on the basis that although penalties were secondary obligations, the parties meant what they said. They intended the provision to be applied according to the letter with a view to penalising breach. The law relieved the contract-breaker of the consequences not because the objective could be secured in another way but because the objective was contrary to public policy and should not therefore be given effect at all. The difference in approach to penalties of the courts of equity and the common law courts is in many ways a classic example of the contrast between the flexible if sometimes unpredictable approach of equity and the clear if relatively strict approach of the common law.

8 With the gradual decline of the use of penal defeasible bonds, the common law on penalties was developed almost entirely in the context of damages clauses—i.e. clauses which provided for payment of a specified sum in place of common law damages. Because they were a contractual substitute for common law damages, they could not in any meaningful sense be regarded as a mere security for their payment. If the agreed sum was a penalty, it was treated as unenforceable. Starting with the decisions in Astley v Weldon 2 Bos & P 346 in 1801 and Kemble v Farren (1829) 6 Bing 141, the common law courts introduced the now familiar distinction between a provision for the payment of a sum representing a genuine pre-estimate of damages and a penalty clause in which the sum was out of all proportion to any damages liable to be suffered. By the middle of the 19th century, this rule was well established. In Betts v Burch (1859) 4 H & N 506, 509, Martin B regretted that he was “bound by the cases” and prevented from holding that “parties are at liberty to enter into any bargain they please” so that “if they have made an improvident bargain they must take the consequences.” But Bramwell B, at p 511, appeared to have no such reservations.

9 The distinction between a clause providing for a genuine pre-estimate of damages and a penalty clause has remained fundamental to the modern law, as it is currently understood. The question whether a damages clause is a penalty falls to be decided as a matter of construction, therefore as at the time that it is agreed: Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368, 376; Webster v Bosanquet [1912] AC 394; Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, 86–87 (Lord Dunedin) and Cooden Engineering Co Ltd v Stanford [1953] 1 QB 86, 94 (Somervell LJ). This is because it depends on the character of the provision, not on the circumstances in which it falls to be enforced. It is a species of agreement which the common law considers to be by its nature contrary to the policy of the law. One consequence of this is that relief from the effects of a penalty is, as Hoffmann LJ put it in Else (1982) Ltd v Parkland Holdings Ltd [1994] 1 BCLC 130, 144, “mechanical in effect and involves no exercise of discretion at all.” Another is that the penalty clause is wholly unenforceable: Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, 9, 10 (the Earl of Halsbury LC); Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd v Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd [1974] AC 689, 698 (Lord Reid), p 703 (Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest) and pp 723–724 (Lord Salmon); Scandinavian Trading Tanker Co AB v Flota Petrolera Ecuatoriana (The Scaptrade) [1983] 2 AC 694, 702 (Lord Diplock); AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd

A v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170, 191–193 (Mason and Wilson JJ). Deprived of the benefit of the provision, the innocent party is left to his remedy in damages under the general law. As Lord Diplock put it in The Scaptrade, at p 702:

B “The classic form of penalty clause is one which provides that upon breach of a primary obligation under the contract a secondary obligation shall arise on the part of the party in breach to pay to the other party a sum of money which does not represent a genuine pre-estimate of any loss likely to be sustained by him as the result of the breach of primary obligation but is substantially in excess of that sum. The classic form of relief against such a penalty clause has been to refuse to give effect to it, but to award the common law measure of damages for the breach of primary obligation instead.”

C 10 Equity, on the other hand, relieves against forfeitures

D “where the primary object of the bargain is to secure a stated result which can effectively be attained when the matter comes before the court, and where the forfeiture provision is added by way of security for the production of that result”: Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 723 (Lord Wilberforce).

As Lord Wilberforce said, at p 722, the paradigm cases are the jurisdiction to relieve from a right of re-entry in a lease of land and the mortgagor’s equity of redemption (and the associated equitable right to redeem) in relation to mortgages. Save in relation to non-payment of rent, the power to grant relief from forfeiture to lessees is now contained in section 146 of the Law of Property Act 1925, and probably exclusively so: see Official Custodian for Charities v Parway Estates Departments Ltd [1985] Ch 151. Relief for mortgagors through the equitable right to redeem is (save in relation to most residential properties) largely still based on judge-made law. However, neither by statute nor on general principles of equity is a lessor’s right of re-entry or a mortgagee’s right of sale or foreclosure treated as being by its nature contrary to the policy of the law. What equity (and, where it applies, statute) typically considers to be contrary to the policy of the law is the enforcement of such rights in circumstances where their purpose, namely the performance of the obligations in the lease or the mortgage, can be achieved in other ways—normally by late substantive compliance and payment of appropriate compensation. The forfeiture or foreclosure/power of sale is therefore enforceable, equity intervening only to impose terms. These will generally require the lessee or mortgagor to rectify the breach and make good any loss suffered by the lessor or mortgagee. If the lessee or mortgagee cannot or will not do so, the forfeiture will be unconditionally enforced—although perhaps not invariably: see per Lord Templeman in Associated British Ports v CH Bailey plc [1990] 2 AC 703, 707–708 in the context of section 146, and, more generally, the judgments in Çukurova Finance International Ltd v Alfa Telecom Turkey Ltd (No 4) [2016] AC 923, 974.

H 11 The penalty rule as it has been developed by the judges gives rise to two questions, both of which have a considerable bearing on the questions which arise on these appeals. In what circumstances is the rule engaged at all? And what makes a contractual provision penal?

In what circumstances is the penalty rule engaged?

12 In England, it has always been considered that a provision could not be a penalty unless it provided an exorbitant alternative to common law damages. This meant that it had to be a provision operating on a breach of contract. In Moss Empires Ltd v Olympia (Liverpool) Ltd [1939] AC 544, this was taken for granted by Lord Atkin (p 551) and Lord Porter: p 558. As a matter of authority the question is settled in England by the decision of the House of Lords in Export Credits Guarantee Department v Universal Oil Products Co [1983] 1 WLR 399 (“ECGD”). Lord Roskill, with whom the rest of the committee agreed, said, at p 403:

“perhaps the main purpose, of the law relating to penalty clauses is to prevent a plaintiff recovering a sum of money in respect of a breach of contract committed by a defendant which bears little or no relationship to the loss actually suffered by the plaintiff as a result of the breach by the defendant. But it is not and never has been for the courts to relieve a party from the consequences of what may in the event prove to be an onerous or possibly even a commercially imprudent bargain.”

As Lord Hodge JSC points out in his judgment, the Scottish authorities are to the same effect.

13 This principle is worth restating at the outset of any analysis of the penalty rule, because it explains much about the way in which it has developed. There is a fundamental difference between a jurisdiction to review the fairness of a contractual obligation and a jurisdiction to regulate the remedy for its breach. Leaving aside challenges going to the reality of consent, such as those based on fraud, duress or undue influence, the courts do not review the fairness of men’s bargains either at law or in equity. The penalty rule regulates only the remedies available for breach of a party’s primary obligations, not the primary obligations themselves. This was not a new concept in 1983, when ECGD was decided. It had been the foundation of the equitable jurisdiction, which depended on the treatment of penal defeasible bonds as secondary obligations or, as Lord Thurlow LC put it in 1783 in Sloman v Walter 1 Bro CC 418, 419, as “collateral” or “accessional” to the primary obligation. And it provided the whole basis of the classic distinction made at law between a penalty and a genuine pre-estimate of loss, the former being essentially a way of punishing the contract-breaker rather than compensating the innocent party for his breach. We shall return to that distinction below.

14 This means that in some cases the application of the penalty rule may depend on how the relevant obligation is framed in the instrument, ie whether as a conditional primary obligation or a secondary obligation providing a contractual alternative to damages at law. Thus, where a contract contains an obligation on one party to perform an act, and also provides that, if he does not perform it, he will pay the other party a specified sum of money, the obligation to pay the specified sum is a secondary obligation which is capable of being a penalty; but if the contract does not impose (expressly or impliedly) an obligation to perform the act, but simply provides that, if one party does not perform, he will pay the other party a specified sum, the obligation to pay the specified sum is a conditional primary obligation and cannot be a penalty.

A 15 However, the capricious consequences of this state of affairs are mitigated by the fact that, as the equitable jurisdiction shows, the classification of terms for the purpose of the penalty rule depends on the substance of the term and not on its form or on the label which the parties have chosen to attach to it. As Lord Radcliffe said in Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 622, “the intention of the parties themselves”,
B by which he clearly meant the intention as expressed in the agreement,

“is never inclusive and may be overruled or ignored if the court considers that even its clear expression does not represent ‘the real nature of the transaction’ or what ‘in truth’ it is taken to be” (and cf per Lord Templeman in Street v Mountford [1985] AC 809, 819).

C This aspect of the equitable jurisdiction was inherited by the courts of common law, and has been firmly established since the earliest common law cases.

D 16 Payment of a sum of money is the classic obligation under a penalty clause and, in almost every reported case involving a damages clause, the provision stipulates for the payment of money. However, it seems to us that there is no reason why an obligation to transfer assets (either for nothing or at an undervalue) should not be capable of constituting a penalty. While the penalty rule may be somewhat artificial, it would heighten its artificiality to no evident purpose if it were otherwise. Similarly, the fact that a sum is paid over by one party to the other party as a deposit, in the sense of some sort of surety for the first party’s contractual performance, does not prevent the sum being a penalty, if the second party in due course forfeits the deposit in accordance with the contractual terms, following the first party’s breach of contract: see the Privy Council decisions in Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368, 375–376, and Workers Trust & Merchant Bank Ltd v Dojap Investments Ltd [1993] AC 573. By contrast, in the Else (1982) case [1994] 1 BCLC 130, 146, Hoffmann LJ, citing Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 QB 476 in support, said that, unlike a case where “money has been deposited as security for due performance of [a] party’s obligation”, “retention of E instalments which have been paid under the contract so as to become the absolute property of the vendor does not fall within the penalty rule”,
F although, he added that it was “subject . . . to the jurisdiction for relief against forfeiture.”

G 17 The relationship between penalty clauses and forfeiture clauses is not entirely easy. Given that they had the same origin in equity, but that the law on penalties was then developed through common law while the law on forfeitures was not, this is unsurprising. Some things appear to be clear. Where a proprietary interest or a “proprietary or possessory right” (such as a patent or a lease) is granted or transferred subject to revocation or determination on breach, the clause providing for determination or revocation is a forfeiture and cannot be a penalty, and, while it is enforceable, relief from forfeiture may be granted: see BICC plc v Burndy Corpn [1985] Ch 232, 246–247, 252 (Dillon LJ) and The Scaptrade [1983] 2 AC 694, 701–703 (Lord Diplock). But this does not mean that relief from forfeiture is unavailable in cases not involving land: see Çukurova Finance International Ltd v Alfa Telecom Turkey Ltd (No 3) [2016] AC 923, especially at pp 956–957, paras 92–97, and the cases cited there.

18 What is less clear is whether a provision is capable of being both a penalty clause and a forfeiture clause. It is inappropriate to consider that issue in any detail in this judgment, as we have heard very little argument on forfeitures—unsurprisingly because in neither appeal has it been alleged that any provision in issue is a forfeiture from which relief could be granted. But it is right to mention the possibility that, in some circumstances, a provision could, at least potentially, be a penalty clause as well as a forfeiture clause. We see the force of the arguments to that effect advanced by Lord Mance and Lord Hodge JJSC in their judgments.

What makes a contractual provision penal?

19 As we have already observed, until relatively recently this question was answered almost entirely by reference to straightforward liquidated damages clauses. It was in that context that the House of Lords sought to restate the law in two seminal decisions at the beginning of the 20th century, the Clydebank case [1905] AC 6 in 1904 and the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 in 1915.

20 The Clydebank case [1905] AC 6 was a Scottish appeal about a shipbuilding contract with a provision (described as a “penalty”) for the payment of £500 per week for delayed delivery. The provision was held to be a valid liquidated damages clause, not a penalty. The Earl of Halsbury LC, at p 10, said that the distinction between the two depended on:

“whether it is, what I think gave the jurisdiction to the courts in both countries to interfere at all in an agreement between the parties, unconscionable and extravagant, and one which no court ought to allow to be enforced.”

The Earl of Halsbury LC declined to lay down any “abstract rule” for determining what was unconscionable or extravagant, saying only that it must depend on “the nature of the transaction—the thing to be done, the loss likely to accrue to the person who is endeavouring to enforce the performance of the contract, and so forth.” The Earl of Halsbury LC’s formulation has proved influential, and the two other members of the Appellate Committee both delivered concurring judgments agreeing with it. It is, however, worth drawing attention to an observation of Lord Robertson, at pp 19–20, which points to the principle underlying the contrasting expressions “liquidated damages” and “penalty”:

“Now, all such agreements, whether the thing be called penalty or be called liquidate damage, are in intention and effect what Professor Bell calls ‘instruments of restraint’, and in that sense penal. But the clear presence of this element does not in the least degree invalidate the stipulation. The question remains, had the respondents no interest to protect by that clause, or was that interest palpably incommensurate with the sums agreed on? It seems to me that to put this question, in the present instance, is to answer it.”

21 The Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 arose out of a contract for the supply of tyres, covers and tubes by a manufacturer to a garage. The contract contained a number of terms designed to protect the manufacturer’s brand, including prohibitions on tampering with the marks, restrictions on the unauthorised export or exhibition of the goods, and on resales to

A unapproved persons. There was also a resale price maintenance clause, which would now be unlawful but was a legitimate restriction of competition according to the notions prevailing in 1914. It was this clause which the purchaser had broken. The contract provided for the payment of £5 for every tyre, cover or tube sold in breach of any provision of the agreement. Once again, the provision was held to be a valid liquidated damages clause. In his speech, Lord Dunedin formulated four tests “which if applicable to the case under consideration may prove helpful, or even conclusive”: p 87. They were (a) that the provision would be penal if “the sum stipulated for is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach”; (b) that the provision would be penal if the breach consisted only in the non-payment of money and it provided for the payment of a larger sum; (c) that there was “a presumption (but no more)” that it would be penal if it was payable in a number of events of varying gravity; and (d) that it would not be treated as penal by reason only of the impossibility of precisely pre-estimating the true loss.

22 Lord Dunedin’s speech in the Dunlop case achieved the status of a quasi-statutory code in the subsequent case law. Some of the many decisions on the validity of damages clauses are little more than a detailed exegesis or application of his four tests with a view to discovering whether the clause in issue can be brought within one or more of them. In our view, this is unfortunate. In the first place, Lord Dunedin proposed his four tests not as rules but only as considerations which might prove helpful or even conclusive “if applicable to the case under consideration”. He did not suggest that they were applicable to every case in which the law of penalties was engaged. Second, as Lord Dunedin himself acknowledged, the essential question was whether the clause impugned was “unconscionable” or “extravagant”. The four tests are a useful tool for deciding whether these expressions can properly be applied to simple damages clauses in standard contracts. But they are not easily applied to more complex cases. To deal with those, it is necessary to consider the rationale of the penalty rule at a more fundamental level. What is it that makes a provision for the consequences of breach “unconscionable”? And by comparison with what is a penalty clause said to be “extravagant”? Third, none of the other three Law Lords expressly agreed with Lord Dunedin’s reasoning, and the four tests do not all feature in any of their speeches. Indeed, it appears that, in his analysis at pp 101–102, Lord Parmoor may have taken a more restrictive view of what constituted a penalty than did Lord Dunedin. More generally, the other members of the Appellate Committee gave their own reasons for concurring in the result, and they also repay consideration. For present purposes, the most instructive is that of Lord Atkinson, who approached the matter on an altogether broader basis.

23 Lord Atkinson pointed, at pp 90–91, to the critical importance to Dunlop of the protection of their brand, reputation and goodwill, and their authorised distribution network. Against this background, he observed, at pp 91–92:

“It has been urged that as the sum of 5l becomes payable on the sale of even one tube at a shilling less than the listed price, and as it was impossible that the appellant company should lose that sum on such a transaction, the sum fixed must be a penalty. In the sense of direct and immediate loss the appellants lose nothing by such a sale. It is the agent or dealer who loses by selling at a price less than that at which he buys, but the appellants have to look at their trade in globo, and to prevent the setting up, in reference to all their goods anywhere and everywhere, a system of injurious undercutting. The object of the appellants in making this agreement, if the substance and reality of the thing and the real nature of the transaction be looked at, would appear to be a single one, namely, to prevent the disorganisation of their trading system and the consequent injury to their trade in many directions. The means of effecting this is by keeping up their price to the public to the level of their price list, this last being secured by contracting that a sum of 51 shall be paid for every one of the three classes of articles named sold or offered for sale at prices below those named on the list. The very fact that this sum is to be paid if a tyre cover or tube be merely offered for sale, though not sold, shows that it was the consequential injury to their trade due to undercutting that they had in view. They had an obvious interest to prevent this undercutting, and on the evidence it would appear to me impossible to say that that interest was incommensurate with the sum agreed to be paid.”

Lord Atkinson went on to draw an analogy, which has particular resonance in the Cavendish appeal, with a clause dealing with damages for breach of a restrictive covenant on the canvassing of business by a former employee. In this context, he said, at pp 92–93:

“It is, I think, quite misleading to concentrate one’s attention upon the particular act or acts by which, in such cases as this, the rivalry in trade is set up, and the repute acquired by the former employee that he works cheaper and charges less than his old master, and to lose sight of the risk to the latter that old customers, once tempted to leave him, may never return to deal with him, or that business that might otherwise have come to him may be captured by his rival. The consequential injuries to the trader’s business arising from each breach by the employee of his covenant cannot be measured by the direct loss in a monetary point of view on the particular transaction constituting the breach.”

Lord Atkinson was making substantially the same point as Lord Robertson had made in the Clydebank case [1905] AC 6. The question was: what was the nature and extent of the innocent party’s interest in the performance of the relevant obligation. That interest was not necessarily limited to the mere recovery of compensation for the breach. Lord Atkinson considered that the underlying purpose of the resale price maintenance clause gave Dunlop a wider interest in enforcing the damages clause than pecuniary compensation. £5 per item was not incommensurate with that interest even if it was incommensurate with the loss occasioned by the wrongful sale of a single item.

24 Although the other members of the Appellate Committee did not express themselves in the same terms as Lord Atkinson, their approach was entirely consistent with his. Lord Parker of Waddington [1915] AC 79, 97, said that “whether the sum agreed to be paid on the breach is really a penalty must depend on the circumstances of each particular case”, and at p 99, echoing Lord Atkinson’s fuller treatment of the point, as just set out, he

A described the damage which would result from any breach as “consist[ing] in the disturbance or derangement of the system of distribution by means of which [Dunlop’s] goods reach the ultimate consumer.” In their speeches, Lord Dunedin, at p 87, Lord Parker, at p 98, and Lord Parmoor, at p 103, ultimately were content to rest their decision that the £5 was not a penalty on the ground that an exact pre-estimate of loss was impossible, whereas, in
 B the passages quoted above, Lord Atkinson analysed why that was so. It seems clear that the actual result of the case was strongly influenced by Lord Atkinson’s reasoning. The clause was upheld although, on the face of it, it failed all but the last of Lord Dunedin’s tests. The £5 per item applied to breaches of very variable significance and it was impossible to relate the loss attributable to the sale of that item. It was justifiable only by reference to the C wider interests identified by Lord Atkinson.

25 The great majority of cases decided in England since the Dunlop case have concerned more or less standard damages clauses in consumer contracts, and Lord Dunedin’s four tests have proved perfectly adequate for dealing with those. More recently, however, the courts have returned to the possibility of a broader test in less straightforward cases, in the context of D the supposed “commercial justification” for clauses which might otherwise be regarded as penal. An early example is the decision of the House of Lords in The Scaptrade [1983] 2 AC 694, 702, where Lord Diplock, with whom the rest of the Appellate Committee agreed, observed that a right to withdraw a time-chartered vessel for non-payment of advance hire was not a penalty because its commercial purpose was to create a fund from which the cost of providing the chartered service could be funded.

26 In Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752, Colman J was concerned with a common form provision in a syndicated loan agreement for interest to be payable at a higher rate during any period when the borrower was in default. There was authority that such provisions were penal: Lady Holles v Wyse (1693) 2 Vern 289; Strode v Parker (1694) 2 Vern 316, Wallingford v Mutual Society (1880) 5 App Cas 685, 702 (Lord
 F Hatherley). But Colman J held that the clause was valid because its predominant purpose was not to deter default but to reflect the greater credit risk associated with a borrower in default. At [1996] QB 752, 763–764, he observed that a provision for the payment of money on breach could not be categorised as a penalty simply because it was not a genuine pre-estimate of damages, saying that there would seem to be:

G “no reason in principle why a contractual provision the effect of which was to increase the consideration payable under an executory contract upon the happening of a default should be struck down as a penalty if the increase could in the circumstances be explained as commercially justifiable, provided always that its dominant purpose was not to deter the other party from breach.”

H 27 Colman J’s approach was approved by Mance LJ, delivering the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal in Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401, para 13. A similar view was taken by Arden LJ in Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946, para 54(v), where she posed the question:

“Has the party who seeks to establish that the clause is a penalty shown that the amount payable under the clause was imposed in terrorem, or that it does not constitute a genuine pre-estimate of loss for the purposes of the Dunlop case, and, if he has shown the latter, is there some other reason which justifies the discrepancy between [the amount payable under the clause and the amount payable by way of damages in common law]?” (Emphasis added.)

She considered that the clause in question had advantages for both sides, and pointed out that no evidence had been adduced to show that the clause lacked commercial justification: see paras 70–76. But Buxton LJ put the matter on a wider basis for which Clarke LJ, at para 105, expressed a preference. He referred to the speech of Lord Atkinson in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 and suggested [2005] IRLR 946, para 117 that the ratio of the actual decision in that case had been that “an explanation of the clause in commercial rather than deterrent terms was available”. All three members of the court endorsed the approach of Colman J in the Lordsvale case [1996] QB 752 and Mance LJ in the Cine Bes case [2004] 1 CLC 401.

28 Colman J in the Lordsvale case and Arden LJ in the Murray case [2005] IRLR 946 were inclined to rationalise the introduction of commercial justification as part of the test, by treating it as evidence that the impugned clause was not intended to deter. Later decisions in which a commercial rationale has been held inconsistent with the application of the penalty rule, have tended to follow that approach: see, for example, Euro London Appointments Ltd v Claessens International Ltd [2006] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 436 and General Trading Co (Holdings) Ltd v Richmond Corp’n Ltd [2008] 2 Lloyd’s Rep 475. It had the advantage of enabling them to reconcile the concept of commercial justification with Lord Dunedin’s four tests. But we have some misgivings about it. The assumption that a provision cannot have a deterrent purpose if there is a commercial justification, seems to us to be questionable. By the same token, we agree with Lord Radcliffe’s observations in the Campbell Discount case [1962] AC 600, 622, where he said:

“I do not myself think that it helps to identify a penalty, to describe it as in the nature of a threat ‘to be enforced in terrorem’ (to use Lord Halsbury’s phrase in Elphinstone v Monkland Iron & Coal Co Ltd (1886) 11 App Cas 332, 348). I do not find that that description adds anything of substance to the idea conveyed by the word ‘penalty’ itself, and it obscures the fact that penalties may quite readily be undertaken by parties who are not in the least terrorised by the prospect of having to pay them and yet are, as I understand it, entitled to claim the protection of the court when they are called upon to make good their promises.”

Moreover, the penal character of a clause depends on its purpose, which is ordinarily an inference from its effect. As we have already explained, this is a question of construction, to which evidence of the commercial background is of course relevant in the ordinary way. But, for the same reason, the answer cannot depend on evidence of actual intention: see Chartbrook Ltd v Persimmon Homes Ltd [2009] AC 1101, paras 28–47 (Lord Hoffmann). However, while we have misgivings about some aspects of their reasoning, these aspects are peripheral to the essential point which Colman J and

A Buxton LJ were making, and we consider that their emphasis on justification provides a valuable insight into the real basis of the penalty rule. It is the same insight as that of Lord Robertson in the Clydebank case [1905] AC 6 and Lord Atkinson in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79. A damages clause may properly be justified by some other consideration than the desire to recover compensation for a breach. This must depend on whether the innocent party has a legitimate interest in performance extending beyond the prospect of pecuniary compensation flowing directly from the breach in question.

B 29 The availability of remedies for a breach of duty is not simply a question of providing a financial substitute for performance. It engages broader social and economic considerations, one of which is that the law will not generally make a remedy available to a party, the adverse impact of which on the defaulter significantly exceeds any legitimate interest of the innocent party. In the famous case White and Carter (Councils) Ltd v McGregor [1962] AC 413, 431 Lord Reid observed:

C “It may well be that, if it can be shown that a person has no legitimate interest, financial or otherwise, in performing the contract rather than claiming damages, he ought not to be allowed to saddle the other party with an additional burden with no benefit to himself. If a party has no interest to enforce a stipulation, he cannot in general enforce it: so it might be said that, if a party has no interest to insist on a particular remedy, he ought not to be allowed to insist on it. And, just as a party is not allowed to enforce a penalty, so he ought not to be allowed to penalise the other party by taking one course when another is equally advantageous to him . . . Here the respondent did not set out to prove that the appellants had no legitimate interest in completing the contract and claiming the contract price rather than claiming damages . . . Parliament has on many occasions relieved parties from certain kinds of improvident or oppressive contracts, but the common law can only do that in very limited circumstances.”

D In the White and Carter case the innocent party was entitled to ignore the repudiation of the contract-breaker and proceed to perform, claiming his remuneration in debt rather than limiting himself to damages, notwithstanding that this course might be a great deal more expensive for the contract-breaker. This, according to Lord Reid, p 431, was because the contract-breaker “did not set out to prove that the appellants had no legitimate interest in completing the contract and claiming the contract price rather than claiming damages.”

E F G 30 More generally, the attitude of the courts, reflecting that of the Court of Chancery, is that specific performance of contractual obligations should ordinarily be refused where damages would be an adequate remedy. This is because the minimum condition for an order of specific performance is that the innocent party should have a legitimate interest extending beyond pecuniary compensation for the breach. The paradigm case is the purchase of land or certain chattels such as ships, which the law recognises as unique. Because of their uniqueness the purchaser’s interest extends beyond the mere award of damages as a substitute for performance. As Lord Hoffmann put it in addressing a very similar issue “the purpose of the law of contract is not to punish wrongdoing but to satisfy the expectations of the party entitled to performance”: Co-operative Insurance Society Ltd v Argyll Stores (Holdings) Ltd [1998] AC 1, 15. A

31 In our opinion, the law relating to penalties has become the prisoner of artificial categorisation, itself the result of unsatisfactory distinctions: between a penalty and genuine pre-estimate of loss, and between a genuine pre-estimate of loss and a deterrent. These distinctions originate in an over-literal reading of Lord Dunedin’s four tests and a tendency to treat them as almost immutable rules of general application which exhaust the field. In Legione v Hateley (1983) 152 CLR 406, 445, Mason and Deane JJ defined a penalty as follows: B

“A penalty, as its name suggests, is in the nature of a punishment for non-observance of a contractual stipulation; it consists of the imposition of an additional or different liability upon breach of the contractual stipulation . . .” C

All definition is treacherous as applied to such a protean concept. This one can fairly be said to be too wide in the sense that it appears to be apt to cover many provisions which would not be penalties (for example most, if not all, forfeiture clauses). However, in so far as it refers to “punishment” and “an additional or different liability” as opposed to “in terrorem” and “genuine pre-estimate of loss”, this definition seems to us to get closer to the concept of a penalty than any other definition we have seen. The real question when a contractual provision is challenged as a penalty is whether it is penal, not whether it is a pre-estimate of loss. These are not natural opposites or mutually exclusive categories. A damages clause may be neither or both. The fact that the clause is not a pre-estimate of loss does not therefore, at any rate without more, mean that it is penal. To describe it as a deterrent (or, to use the Latin equivalent, in terrorem) does not add anything. A deterrent provision in a contract is simply one species of provision designed to influence the conduct of the party potentially affected. It is no different in this respect from a contractual inducement. Neither is it inherently penal or contrary to the policy of the law. The question whether it is enforceable should depend on whether the means by which the contracting party’s conduct is to be influenced are “unconscionable” or (which will usually amount to the same thing) “extravagant” by reference to some norm. D

32 The true test is whether the impugned provision is a secondary obligation which imposes a detriment on the contract-breaker out of all proportion to any legitimate interest of the innocent party in the enforcement of the primary obligation. The innocent party can have no proper interest in simply punishing the defaulter. His interest is in performance or in some appropriate alternative to performance. In the case of a straightforward damages clause, that interest will rarely extend beyond compensation for the breach, and we therefore expect that Lord Dunedin’s four tests would usually be perfectly adequate to determine its validity. But compensation is not necessarily the only legitimate interest that the innocent party may have in the performance of the defaulter’s primary obligations. This was recognised in the early days of the penalty rule, when it was still the creature of equity, and is reflected in Lord Macclesfield LC’s observation in the Peachy case 1 Str 447 (quoted in para 5 above) about the application of the penalty rule to provisions which were “never intended by way of compensation”, for which equity would not relieve. It was reflected in the G
H

A result in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79. And it is recognised in the more recent decisions about commercial justification. And, as Lord Hodge JSC shows, it is the principle underlying the Scottish authorities.

B 33 The penalty rule is an interference with freedom of contract. It undermines the certainty which parties are entitled to expect of the law. Diplock LJ was neither the first nor the last to observe that “The court should not be astute to descry a ‘penalty clause’”: the Robophone case [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1447. As Lord Woolf said, speaking for the Privy Council in Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41, 59, “the court has to be careful not to set too stringent a standard and bear in mind that what the parties have agreed should normally be upheld”, not least because “any other approach will lead to undesirable uncertainty especially in commercial contracts”.

C 34 Although the penalty rule originates in the concern of the courts to prevent exploitation in an age when credit was scarce and borrowers were particularly vulnerable, the modern rule is substantive, not procedural. It does not normally depend for its operation on a finding that advantage was taken of one party. As Lord Wright MR observed in Imperial Tobacco Co (of Great Britain and Ireland) Ltd v Parslay [1936] 2 All ER 515, 523:

D “A millionaire may enter into a contract in which he is to pay liquidated damages, or a poor man may enter into a similar contract with a millionaire, but in each case the question is exactly the same, namely, whether the sum stipulated as damages for the breach was exorbitant or extravagant . . .”

E 35 But for all that, the circumstances in which the contract was made are not entirely irrelevant. In a negotiated contract between properly advised parties of comparable bargaining power, the strong initial presumption must be that the parties themselves are the best judges of what is legitimate in a provision dealing with the consequences of breach. In that connection, it is worth noting that in the Philips Hong Kong case 61 BLR 41, 57–59, Lord Woolf specifically referred to the possibility of taking into account the fact that “one of the parties to the contract is able to dominate the other as to the choice of the terms of a contract” when deciding whether a damages clause was a penalty. In doing so, he reflected the view expressed by Mason and Wilson JJ in the AMEV-UDC case 162 CLR 170, 194 that the courts were thereby able to “strike a balance between the competing interests of freedom of contract and protection of weak contracting parties” (citing Atiyah, The Rise and Fall of Freedom of Contract (1979), chapter 22). However, Lord Woolf was rightly at pains to point out that this did not mean that the courts could thereby adopt “some broader discretionary approach”. The notion that the bargaining position of the parties may be relevant is also supported by Lord Browne-Wilkinson giving the judgment of the Privy Council in the Workers Trust case [1993] AC 573. At p 580, he rejected the notion that “the test of reasonableness [could] depend upon the practice of one class of vendor, which exercises considerable financial muscle” as it would allow such people “to evade the law against penalties by adopting practices of their own.” In his judgment, he decided that, in contracts for sale of land, a clause providing for a forfeitable deposit of 10% of the purchase price was valid, although it was an anomalous exception to the penalty rule. However, he held that the clause providing for a forfeitable

25% deposit in that case was invalid because “in Jamaica, the customary deposit has been 10%” and “[a] vendor who seeks to obtain a larger amount by way of forfeitable deposit must show special circumstances which justify such a deposit”, which the appellant vendor in that case failed to do.

Should the penalty rule be abrogated?

36 The primary case of Miss Smith QC, who appeared for Cavendish in the first appeal, was that the penalty rule should now be regarded as antiquated, anomalous and unnecessary, especially in the light of the growing importance of statutory regulation in this field. It is the creation of the judges, and, she argued, the judges should now take the opportunity to abolish it. There is a case to be made for taking this course. It was expounded with considerable forensic skill by Miss Smith, and has some powerful academic support: see Sarah Worthington, “Common Law Values: the Role of Party Autonomy in Private Law”, in The Common Law of Obligations: Divergence and Unity (eds Andrew Robertson and Michael Tilbury) (2016), ch 14 (also Cambridge University Faculty of Law Legal Studies Research Paper No 33/2015 (June 2015)). We rather doubt that the courts would have invented the rule today if their predecessors had not done so three centuries ago. But this is not the way in which English law develops, and we do not consider that judicial abolition would be a proper course for this court to take.

37 The first point to be made is that the penalty rule is not only a long-standing principle of English law, but is common to almost all major systems of law, at any rate in the western world. It has existed in England since the 16th century and can be traced back to the same period in Scotland: McBryde, The Law of Contract in Scotland, 3rd ed (2007), para 22-148. The researches of counsel have shown that it has been adopted with some variants in all common law jurisdictions, including those of the United States. A corresponding rule was derived from Roman law by Pothier, Traité des Obligations, No 346, which is to be found in the Civil Codes of France (article 1152), Germany (for non-commercial contracts only) (sections 343, 348), Switzerland (article 163.3), Belgium (article 1231) and Italy (article 1384). It is included in influential attempts to codify the law of contracts internationally, including the UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts (2010) (article 7.4.13), and the UNCITRAL Uniform Rules on Contract Clauses for an Agreed Sum Due upon Failure of Performance (1983) (article 6). In January 1978 the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe recommended a number of common principles relating to penal clauses, including (article 7) that a stipulated sum payable on breach “may be reduced by the court when it is manifestly excessive”.

38 It is true that statutory regulation, which hardly existed at the time that the penalty rule was developed, is now a significant feature of the law of contract. In England, the landmark legislation was the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977. For most purposes, the Act was superseded by the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1994 (SI 1994/3159), which was in turn replaced by the 1999 Regulations, both of which give effect to European Directives. The 1999 Regulations contain in Schedule 2 an “indicative and non-exhaustive list of the terms which may be regarded as unfair”, including terms which have the object or effect of “requiring any

A consumer who fails to fulfil his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation”. None the less, statutory regulation is very far from covering the whole field. Penalty clauses are controlled by the 1999 Regulations, but the Regulations apply only to consumer contracts and the control of unfair terms under regulations 3 and 5 is limited to those which have not been individually negotiated. There are major areas, notably non-consumer contracts, which are not regulated by statute. Some of those who enter into such contracts, for example professionals and small businesses, may share many of the characteristics of consumers which are thought to make the latter worthy of legal protection. The English Law Commission considered penalty clauses in 1975 (Working Paper No 61, Penalty Clauses and Forfeiture of Moneys Paid, April 1975), at a time when there was no relevant statutory regulation, and the Scottish Law Commission reported on them in May 1999 (Scot Law Com No 171). Neither of these reports recommended abolition of the rule. On the contrary, both recommended legislation which would have expanded its scope.

39 Further, although there are justified criticisms that can be made of the penalty rule, it is consistent with other well established principles which have been developed by judges (albeit mostly in the Chancery courts) and which involve the court in declining to give full force to contractual provisions, such as relief from forfeiture, the equity of redemption, and refusal to grant specific performance, as discussed in paras 10–11 and 29–30 above. Finally, the case for abolishing the rule depends heavily on anomalies in the operation of the law as it has traditionally been understood. Many, though not all of these are better addressed (i) by a realistic appraisal of the substance of contractual provisions operating on breach, and (ii) by taking a more principled approach to the interests that may properly be protected by the terms of the parties’ agreement.

Should the penalty rule be extended?

40 In the course of his cogent submissions, Mr Bloch QC, who appeared for Mr Makdessi on the first appeal, suggested that, as an alternative to confirming or abrogating the penalty rule, this court could extend it, so that it applied more generally. As he pointed out, this was the course taken by the High Court of Australia, and it would have the advantage of rendering the penalty rule less formalistic in its application, and, which may be putting the point in a different way, less capable of avoidance by ingenious drafting.

41 This step has recently been taken in Australia. Until recently, the law in Australia was the same as it is in England: see IAC (Leasing) Ltd v Humphrey (1972) 126 CLR 131, 143 (Walsh J); O’Dea v Allstates Leasing System (WA) Pty Ltd (1983) 152 CLR 359, 390 (Brennan J); the AMEV-UDC case 162 CLR 170, 184 (Mason and Wilson JJ, citing ECGD [1983] 1 WLR 399 among other authorities), p 211 (Dawson J); Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656, 662. However, a radical departure from the previous understanding of the law occurred with the decision of the High Court of Australia in Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205. The background to this case was very similar to that in Office of Fair Trading v Abbey National plc [2010] 1 AC 696. It concerned the application of the penalty rule to contractual bank charges payable when the bank bounced a cheque or allowed the customer to draw in excess of his available funds or agreed overdraft limit. These might in a loose sense be regarded as banking irregularities, but they did not involve any breach of contract on the part of the customer. On that ground Andrew Smith J had held in the Abbey National case [2008] 2 All ER (Comm) 625, paras 295–299 that the charges were incapable of being penalties (the point was not appealed). In the Andrews case 247 CLR 205, the High Court of Australia disagreed. They engaged in a detailed historical examination of the equitable origin of the rule and concluded that there subsisted, independently of the common law rule, an equitable jurisdiction to relieve against any sufficiently onerous provision which was conditional on a failure to observe some other provision, whether or not that failure was a breach of contract. At para 10, they defined a penalty as follows:

“In general terms, a stipulation prima facie imposes a penalty on a party (‘the first party’) if, as a matter of substance, it is collateral (or accessory) to a primary stipulation in favour of a second party and this collateral stipulation, upon the failure of the primary stipulation, imposes upon the first party an additional detriment, the penalty, to the benefit of the second party. In that sense, the collateral or accessory stipulation is described as being in the nature of a security for and in terrorem of the satisfaction of the primary stipulation. If compensation can be made to the second party for the prejudice suffered by failure of the primary stipulation, the collateral stipulation and the penalty are enforced only to the extent of that compensation. The first party is relieved to that degree from liability to satisfy the collateral stipulation.”

42 Any decision of the High Court of Australia has strong persuasive force in this court. But we cannot accept that English law should take the same path, quite apart from its inconsistency with established and unchallenged House of Lords authority. In the first place, although the reasoning in the Andrews case was entirely historical, it is not in fact consistent with the equitable rule as it developed historically. The equitable jurisdiction to relieve from penalties arose wholly in the context of bonds defeasible in the event of the performance of a contractual obligation. It necessarily posited a breach of that obligation. Secondly, if there is a distinct and still subsisting equitable jurisdiction to relieve against penalties which is wider than the common law jurisdiction, with three possible exceptions it appears to have left no trace in the authorities since the fusion of law and equity in 1873. The first arguable exception is in In re Dagenham (Thames) Dock Co; Ex p Hulse (1873) LR 8 Ch App 1022 (followed by the Privy Council in Kilmer v British Columbia Orchard Lands Ltd [1913] AC 319), where the Court of Appeal in Chancery granted a purchaser, who had been in possession for five years and carried out improvements, further time to pay the second and final instalment of a purchase price on the ground that the clause requiring him to vacate and to forfeit the first instalment for not having paid the second instalment on time, was a “penalty”. However, Sir James and Sir Mellish LJ may have been treating the clause as a forfeiture (as they both also used that expression in their brief judgments), and in any event they treated the purchaser in the same way as a mortgagor in possession asking for more time to pay. Further, as Romer LJ pointed out in

A the Stockloser case [1954] 1 QB 476, 497–498, the decision could be justified by the fact that time had already been extended twice by agreement, and in any event there was no question of the vendor being required to repay the first instalment. The second arguable exception is no more than an unsupported throw-away line in the judgment of Diplock LJ in the Robophone case [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1446, where he said it was “by no means clear” whether penalty clauses “are simply void”, but, on analysis, he

B was dealing with a rather different point (namely that discussed by Lord Atkin in the passage that follows). The third exception is the unsatisfactory decision in Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026, to which we shall return in paras 84–87 below. It is relevant to add in this connection that the law of penalties has been held to be the same in England and Scotland: The Laws of Scotland, Stair Memorial Encyclopaedia, vol 15 (1996), Obligations, paras 783–801, and see the Clydebank case [1905] AC 6. Yet equity, although influential, has never been a distinct branch of Scots law. In the

C modern law of both countries, the penalty rule is an aspect of the law of contract. Thirdly, the High Court’s redefinition of a penalty is, with respect, difficult to apply to the case to which it is supposedly directed, namely where there is no breach of contract. It treats as a potential penalty any clause which is “in the nature of a security for and in terrorem of the satisfaction of

D the primary stipulation.” By a “security” it means a provision to secure “compensation . . . for the prejudice suffered by the failure of the primary stipulation”. This analysis assumes that the “primary stipulation” is some kind of promise, in which case its failure is necessarily a breach of that promise. If, for example, there is no duty not to draw cheques against

E insufficient funds, it is difficult to see where compensation comes into it, or how bank charges for bouncing a cheque or allowing the customer to overdraw can be regarded as securing a right of compensation. Finally, the High Court’s decision does not address the major legal and commercial implications of transforming a rule for controlling remedies for breach of contract into a jurisdiction to review the content of the substantive obligations which the parties have agreed. Modern contracts contain a very

F great variety of contingent obligations. Many of them are contingent on the way that the parties choose to perform the contract. There are provisions for termination on insolvency, contractual payments due on the exercise of an option to terminate, break-fees chargeable on the early repayment of a loan or the closing out of futures contracts in the financial or commodity markets, provisions for variable payments dependent on the standard or speed of performance and “take or pay” provisions in long term oil and gas purchase

G contracts, to take only some of the more familiar types of clause. The potential assimilation of all of these to clauses imposing penal remedies for breach of contract would represent the expansion of the courts’ supervisory jurisdiction into a new territory of uncertain boundaries, which has hitherto been treated as wholly governed by mutual agreement.

43 We would accept that the application of the penalty rule can still turn on questions of drafting, even where a realistic approach is taken to the substance of the transaction and not just its form. But we agree with what

H Hoffmann LJ said in the Else (1982) case [1994] 1 BCLC 130, 145, namely that, while it is true that the question whether the penalty rule applies may sometimes turn on “somewhat formal distinction[s]”, this can be justified by the fact that the rule “being an inroad upon freedom of contract which is inflexible . . . ought not to be extended”, at least by judicial, as opposed to legislative, decision-making. A

The first appeal: Cavendish v Makdessi

The factual and procedural history

44 Mr Makdessi founded a group of companies (“the group”) which by 2008 had become the largest advertising and marketing communications group in the Middle East, and operated through a network of around 20 companies with more than 30 offices in over 15 countries. At that time, Mr Makdessi was one of the most influential Lebanese business leaders, his name was closely identified with the business of the group, and he had very strong relationships with its clients and senior employees. B

45 In 2008, the holding company of the group was Team Y & R Holdings Hong Kong Ltd (“the company”). The company had 1,000 issued shares, which were owned by Mr Makdessi and Mr Joseph Ghossoub, with the exception of 126 shares which were held by Young & Rubicam International Group BV (“Y & RIG”), a company in the WPP group of companies (“WPP”), the world’s largest market communications services group. C

46 By an agreement of 28 February 2008 (“the agreement”) Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub (described as “the sellers”) agreed to sell to Y & RIG (described as “the purchaser”) 474 shares (described as “the sale shares”) in the company. Y & RIG then transferred those shares to Cavendish Square Holdings BV (“Cavendish”), another WPP company, and by a novation agreement of 29 February 2008, Cavendish was substituted for Y & RIG as a party to the agreement. Thus Cavendish came to hold 60% of the company while the sellers retained 40%. For present purposes, Y & RIG can be ignored and the purchaser can be treated as Cavendish. D E

47 The agreement had been the subject of extensive negotiations over six months, and both sides were represented by highly experienced and respected commercial lawyers: Allen & Overy acting for Cavendish, and Lewis Silkin for the sellers, Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub.

48 By clause 3.1, the price payable by Cavendish “[i]n consideration of the sale of the sale shares and the obligations of the sellers herein” (and which was to be apportioned 53.88% to Mr Makdessi and 46.12% to Mr Ghossoub) was to be paid by Cavendish in the following way: (i) a “completion payment” of US$34m to be paid on completion of the agreement; (ii) a “second payment” of US$31.5m to be paid into escrow on completion, and to be released in four instalments, as restructuring of the group companies took effect; (iii) an “interim payment”, to be paid 30 days after agreement of the group operating profits (“OPAT”) for 2007–2009, and to be the amount by which the product of eight, 0.474 and the average annual OPAT 2007–2009 exceeded US$63m (being the sum of the earlier payments less US$ 2.5m representing interest); (iv) a “final payment”, to be paid 30 days after agreement of the OPAT for 2007–2011, and to be the amount by which the product of a figure between seven and ten (depending on the level of profit), 0.474 and the annual average annual OPAT for 2009–2011 exceeded the aggregate of US$63m and the interim payment. Clause 6 contained provisions relating to the “calculation of OPAT and payment of the consideration”. F G H

A 49 Clause 3.2 of the agreement provided that, if the interim payment and/or the final payment turned out to be a negative figure, it or they should be treated as zero, but there was to be no claw back of the earlier payments. Clause 3.3 of the agreement provided that the maximum of all payments would be US$147.5m. By clause 9.1 of, and paragraph 2.15(c) of Schedule 7 to, the agreement, the sellers warranted that the net asset value (“NAV”) of the company at 31 December 2007 was just over US$69.74m.

B 50 Clause 15 contained a put option which entitled each of the sellers to require Cavendish, by a notice served at any time between 1 January and 31 March in 2011 or any subsequent year (in the case of Mr Makdessi) and any time between 1 January and 31 March in 2017 or in any subsequent year (in the case of Mr Ghossoub), to buy all their remaining shares in the company. The price payable on the exercise of this option was (subject to a cap of US$75m in the case of each seller) to be the relevant seller’s proportion of a sum eight times the average OPAT for a reference period of seven years (the year in which the notice was served, the previous year and the two subsequent years). It was to be payable by instalments.

C 51 Clause 11 was concerned with the “protection of goodwill”. Clause 11.1 provided as follows:

D “Each seller recognises the importance of the goodwill of the group to [Cavendish] and the WPP Group which is reflected in the price to be paid by the purchaser for the sale shares. Accordingly, each seller commits as set out in this clause 11 to ensure that the interest of each of [Cavendish] and the WPP Group in that goodwill is properly protected.”

E 52 Clause 11.2 provided that, in Mr Makdessi’s case, until two years after he ceased to hold any shares in the company or the date of the final instalment of any payment under clause 15, and in Mr Ghossoub’s case, until two years after he ceased employment with the company, the sellers would not (a) carry on, or be engaged or interested in “restricted activities” (i.e. the provision of goods or services which competed with the group companies) in “prohibited areas” (i.e. in countries in which any of the group companies carried on business); (b) solicit or accept orders, inquiries or business in respect of restricted activities in the prohibited areas; (c) divert orders, inquiries or business from any group company; or (d) employ or solicit any senior employee or consultant of any group company.

F 53 Clause 11.7 started by recording that Cavendish “recognises the importance of the goodwill of the group to the sellers and to the value of the interim payment and the final payment”. It then contained a covenant by Cavendish that neither it nor any other WPP company would “without the sellers’ prior written consent other than within the group companies, trade in any of the [23 identified] countries . . . using [specified] names [including ‘Adrenalin’]”.

G 54 Under clause 7.5, Messrs Makdessi and Ghossoub agreed that, within four months of completion, they would dispose of any shares in Carat Middle East Sarl (“Carat”), and procure the termination of a joint venture agreement which another Carat company had entered into with a member of the Aegis group of companies. Carat describes itself on its website as “the world’s leading independent media planning and buying specialist . . . [o]wned by global media group Aegis Group plc . . . [with] more than 5,000 people in 70 countries worldwide”. It is a competitor of WPP, including Cavendish and the company. A

55 The two provisions of central relevance for present purposes were included in clause 5, which was headed “Default”. Clauses 5.1 and 5.6 provided:

“5.1 If a seller becomes a defaulting shareholder [which is defined as including ‘a seller who is in breach of clause 11.2’] he shall not be entitled to receive the interim payment and/or the final payment which would other than for his having become a defaulting shareholder have been paid to him and [Cavendish]’s obligations to make such payment shall cease.” B

“5.6 Each seller hereby grants an option to [Cavendish] pursuant to which, in the event that such seller becomes a defaulting shareholder, [Cavendish] may require such seller to sell to [Cavendish] all . . . of the shares held by that seller (the defaulting shareholder shares). [Cavendish] shall buy and such seller shall sell . . . the defaulting shareholder shares . . . within 30 days of receipt by such seller of a notice from [Cavendish] exercising such option in consideration for the payment by [Cavendish] to such seller of the defaulting shareholder option price [defined as ‘an amount equal to the [NAV] on the date that the relevant seller becomes a defaulting shareholder multiplied by [the percentage which represents the proportion of the total shares the relevant seller holds].” C

56 Mr Ghossoub signed an agreement by which he agreed to remain an employee and director of the company. During the negotiations, Mr Makdessi had made it clear that he did not wish to remain an employee. However, he signed an agreement, by which he became a non-executive director of the company (as well as other companies in the group) and non-executive chairman, for an initial term of 18 months which was renewable. Under this he agreed to certain specific obligations by way of ongoing support of the company. D

57 Mr Makdessi resigned as non-executive chairman of the company in April 2009. On 1 July 2009, at the company’s request, he resigned as non-executive director of all companies in the group, save the company itself. He was removed from the board of the company on 27 April 2011, after the commencement of these proceedings. E

58 Mr Makdessi has been paid his share of the first two payments stipulated by clause 3.1, namely the completion payment and the second payment, together with some additional interest. However, he has not yet been paid the remaining payments under clause 3.1, namely the interim payment or the final payment, or any part thereof. His remaining shares represent just over 21.5% of the whole issued share capital of the company. F

59 By December 2010, Cavendish and the company concluded that Mr Makdessi had acted in breach of his duties to the company as a director and in breach of his obligations to Cavendish under clause 11.2 of the agreement. On 13 December 2010 Cavendish gave notice of the exercise of its call option under clause 5.6. G

60 In December 2010, these proceedings were commenced against Mr Makdessi, with Cavendish suing for breach of the agreement, and the company suing for breach of fiduciary duty. Their re-amended particulars allege that in breach of his fiduciary duties and the restrictive covenants H

A Mr Makdessi had throughout 2008 and 2009 in Lebanon and Saudi Arabia (both of which were within the prohibited area), in breach of clause 11.2, engaged in restricted activities, solicited clients and employees away from group companies and accepted orders in respect of restricted activities.

B 61 The essence of the complaints was that Mr Makdessi had (i) continued to provide services to Carat, including assisting it to generate business, diverting business to it and soliciting clients and diverting their business to it; and (ii) set up rival advertising agencies in Lebanon and Saudi Arabia with “Adrenalin” in their name and that those agencies had poached or tried to poach a number of the company’s customers and employees.

C 62 Mr Makdessi subsequently admitted that from February 2008 he had had an ongoing, unpaid involvement in the affairs of Carat pending the appointment of a replacement CEO and that such involvement placed him in breach of fiduciary duty to the company with effect from 1 July 2008, and that, if the covenants in clause 11.2 were valid and enforceable (as they have been held to be) his involvement in the affairs of Carat rendered him a defaulting shareholder within the meaning of the agreement. The company’s claim for breach of fiduciary duty was settled by its acceptance of a payment into court made by Mr Makdessi in the sum of US$500,000.

D Cavendish claimed to have suffered loss and damage in the form of a loss of value of its shareholding in the company, but it subsequently accepted that such loss was irrecoverable as it was merely “reflective” of the loss which could be claimed, indeed had been claimed, by the company.

E 63 More importantly for present purposes, Cavendish claimed that Mr Makdessi’s admissions of breach of fiduciary duty demonstrated that he was in breach of clause 11.2 in relation to (at least) his continued involvement in Carat. Cavendish accordingly sought a declaration that he was a defaulting shareholder, was not entitled to the interim payment or the final payment as a result of clause 5.1, and was obliged, as of the date 30 days after the service of its notice exercising the call option, namely 14 January 2011, to sell to Cavendish all his shares in the company at the defaulting shareholder option price, and it sought specific performance of the latter obligation.

F

G 64 The case was tried by Burton J and the appeal was heard in the Court of Appeal by Patten, Tomlinson and Christopher Clarke LJ. The issue at both stages was the same, namely whether clauses 5.1 and 5.6 were valid and enforceable as Cavendish contended, or whether as Mr Makdessi argued they both were void and unenforceable because they constituted penalties. The courts below were naturally constrained by the perceived need to fit any analysis into the framework set by Lord Dunedin’s four principles. Burton J felt able to escape those constraints, and concluded that the two provisions were valid and enforceable. However, Christopher Clarke LJ, giving the leading judgment in the Court of Appeal, held that the two provisions were unenforceable penalties under the penalty rule as traditionally understood. No short summary can do justice to Christopher Clarke LJ’s thoughtful and careful analysis [2014] 2 All ER (Comm) 125, but essentially he felt unable to uphold Burton J’s decision [2013] 1 All ER (Comm) 787 because he felt bound by the traditional explanation of the rule as being directed against deterrent clauses as such. Cavendish now appeals to this court.

H

The implications of the agreement

65 Clause 5 deals with the obligations of a “defaulting shareholder”. So far as Mr Makdessi was concerned, that meant a seller in breach of the restrictive covenants at clause 11.2. In the case of Mr Ghossoub, who remained an employee of the company, it meant a seller who was either in breach of the restrictive covenants or else had been summarily dismissed on any of a number of specified grounds, all of them serious and potentially discreditable to the company.

66 The background to clause 5 is of some importance. Burton J found that the agreement was negotiated in detail over a considerable period by parties dealing on equal terms with professional assistance of a high order. Cavendish was acquiring 47.4% of the company so as to bring its holding up to 60%. It is common ground that a large proportion of the purchase price represented goodwill. The NAV (without goodwill) of the company was warranted by the sellers at over US$69.7m as at 31 December 2007, whereas the maximum consideration for 47.4% of the company, including the profit-related element, was US$147.5m, implying a maximum value of more than US$300m for the whole group. Clause 11.1 recorded the sellers’ recognition that the restrictive covenants reflected the importance of the goodwill, and Burton J found that its value was heavily dependent on the continuing loyalty of Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub. Subject to various options, they retained a 40% shareholding between them and were expected to maintain their connection with the business for a minimum period, Mr Ghossoub as an employee and director, and Mr Makdessi as a non-executive director and chairman. The following summary in the agreed statement of facts and issues is based on the unchallenged evidence given at the trial:

“The structure of the agreement was typical of acquisition agreements in the marketing sector. As in this case, the vendor is typically the founder or operator of the business, and has important relationships with clients and key staff. If they decide to turn against the business, its success can be significantly affected, and provisions are therefore included to protect the value of the investment, and in particular the value of the goodwill represented by the vendor’s existing personal relationships. The defendant fell into that category; the importance of personal relationships with clients is even stronger in the Middle East than the UK, and he had very strong relationships with clients and senior employees, and he was such a well known figure that if he acted against the group, it would inevitably cause it to lose value.”

67 Clause 3.1 provided that the first two instalments of the purchase price amounted to US$65.5m, which would be received by the sellers in any event. The effect of clause 5.1 was that in the event that a seller acted in breach of the restrictive covenants, he would not be entitled to receive the last two instalments of the purchase price, the interim payment and the final payment, both of which were calculated by reference to the audited consolidated profit of the company for years after completion of the agreement (2007–2009 for the interim payment, and 2007–2011 for the final payment). The result of Cavendish’s exercise of its rights under clause 5.1 according to its terms was to reduce the consideration for the defaulting shareholder’s shares from his proportion of the maximum of

A US$147.5m to his proportion of US$65.5m. In Mr Makdessi's case, he would receive up to US$44,181,600 less.

B 68 Under clause 15, the sellers had a put option to require Cavendish to buy their remaining shareholdings, which in Mr Makdessi's case was first exercisable during the first three months of 2011. The provisions determining the option price have been summarised in para 50 above. It was a multiple of average audited consolidated profit over a reference period, a formula which would reflect the value of goodwill. The effect of clause 5.6 was that if before the exercise of the clause 15 put option a seller was in breach of the restrictive covenants, Cavendish acquired an option to acquire his retained shareholding at a lower price, namely the relevant proportion of the net asset value at the time of the default. The result of Cavendish's implementation of clause 5.6, according to its terms, was that in so far as, at
C the date of default, Mr Makdessi's shareholding had a value attributable to goodwill, he would not receive it and would not be able to exercise the clause 15 put option in 2011.

Was clause 5.1 contrary to the penalty rule?

D 69 Clause 5.1 disentitles a defaulting shareholder from receiving money which would otherwise have been due to him as his proportion of the price of the transferred shares. If this constitutes a forfeiture, it would appear that, at least on the current state of the authorities, there would be no jurisdiction to relieve against it, because a contractual right to be paid money is not a proprietary or possessory interest in property: The Scaptrade [1983] 2 AC 694 and the BICC case [1985] Ch 232: see para 17 above. But there is some, albeit rather unsatisfactory, authority that such a clause may be a
E penalty.

F 70 Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd v Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd [1974] AC 689 concerned a provision in a building subcontract entitling the contractor to "suspend or withhold" the payment of money due to the subcontractor on any breach of contract. Four members of the Appellate Committee accepted, obiter, a concession by counsel that this was a penalty: see p 698 (Lord Reid), pp 703–704 (Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest), p 711 (Viscount Dilhorne), pp 723–724 (Lord Salmon). This was because it allowed the contractor to withhold all sums due, and not just the estimated damages flowing from the sub-contractor's breach. The result was to put intolerable pressures on the latter's cash flow which was calculated to force him into submission.

G 71 The only other English decision directly in point is Socony Mobil Oil Co Inc v West of England Ship Owners Mutual Insurance Association (London) Ltd (The Padre Island) (No 2) [1987] 2 Lloyd's Rep 529 (Saville J); [1989] 1 Lloyd's Rep 239 (CA); [1991] 2 AC 1 (HL(E)), a case notable for the multiplicity of arguments and the diversity of judicial opinions. It was a claim under the Third Parties (Rights against Insurers) Act 1930 by cargo claimants who had obtained judgment for damages against an insolvent ship owner entered with the defendant P & I Club. Saville J dismissed the claim
H on the ground that under the standard "pay to be paid" clause in the rules recovery from the club was conditional on the ship owner having first paid the judgment creditor. Since this had not happened there was no claim to be transferred under the 1930 Act. The Court of Appeal allowed the appeal on this point. They were wrong to do so, as the House of Lords subsequently held. But on the footing that the “pay to be paid” clause did not bar the claim, the Court of Appeal went on to consider an alternative argument on behalf of the club, based on a provision in its rules that cover should retrospectively cease on the insured’s failure to pay a call. The judgment creditor’s answer to this argument was that the provision was unenforceable as a penalty. Saville J had held (i) that this last question did not arise because on the facts the retrospective cesser clause would not have applied anyway, but (ii) that the penalty rule was not engaged because it applied only to provisions which required the contract-breaker to pay money. The Court of Appeal upheld him on (i), as a result of which (ii) did not arise. But Stuart-Smith LJ considered point (ii), obiter. He thought, on the basis of the Gilbert-Ash case, that the penalty rule could apply to a provision disentitling the contract-breaker from receiving a sum of money. He could “see no distinction between withholding or disentitling a person to a sum of money which is due to him and requiring him to pay a sum of money”: p 262. O’Connor LJ said, at p 265, that if the point had arisen he would have been of the same view as Stuart-Smith LJ. Bingham LJ disagreed, and would have held that the penalty rule was not engaged.

72 These two cases thus provide some support for the contention that clause 5.1 is capable of engaging the penalty rule. On the other hand, it has been held that a clause which renders instalments irrecoverable by a defaulting purchaser is a forfeiture but not a penalty: see the Else (1982) case [1994] 1 BCLC 130 and the Stockloser case [1954] 1 QB 476, cited in para 16 above. If that is so, then there is a powerful argument for saying that a clause which renders instalments of payment irrecoverable by a defaulting vendor should, by the same token, not be a penalty, but at best a forfeiture.

73 We are, however, prepared to assume, without deciding, that a contractual provision may in some circumstances be a penalty if it disentitles the contract-breaker from receiving a sum of money which would otherwise have been due to him. But even on that assumption, it will not always be a penalty. That must depend on the nature of the right of which the contract [breaker is being deprived and the basis on which he is being deprived of it. The provision thought to be penal in the Gilbert-Ash case [1974] AC 689 was a good example of a secondary provision operating on a breach of the subcontractor’s primary obligations. It authorised the contractor to withhold all remuneration due to the subcontractor if the latter had committed any breach of contract until the contractor’s claim had been resolved. It was a security, albeit an exorbitant one, for the contractor’s claim. The retrospective cesser clause in the West of England Club’s rules in The Padre Island (No 2) [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 239 was very different. It forfeited an accrued right to indemnity permanently. Clauses of this kind are potentially harsher than those which operate simply as a security. But they may define the primary obligations of the parties, in which case the penalty rule will not apply to them. It is not a proper function of the penalty rule to empower the courts to review the fairness of the parties’ primary obligations, such as the consideration promised for a given standard of performance. For example, the consideration due to one party may be variable according to one or more contingencies, including the contingency of his breach of the contract. There is no reason in principle why a contract should not provide for a party to earn his remuneration, or part of it, by performing his obligations. If as a result his remuneration is reduced on his

A non-performance, there is no reason to regard that outcome as penal. Suppose that a contract of insurance provided that it should be cancelled ab initio if the insured failed to pay the premium within three months of inception. The effect would be to forfeit any claim on a casualty occurring in the first three months but it would be difficult to regard the provision as penal on that account. One reason why Bingham LJ disagreed with Stuart-Smith LJ was that he considered the retrospective cesser clause to be no different. “I do not myself think it unreasonable”, he said, at p 254, “that a member should lose his cover in respect of a period for which he fails to pay his premium.” He may well have been right to analyse the clause in that way, but it is a fair criticism of Stuart-Smith LJ’s approach that he did not consider this aspect of the matter at all.

74 Where, against this background, does clause 5.1 stand? It is plainly not a liquidated damages clause. It is not concerned with regulating the measure of compensation for breach of the restrictive covenants. It is not a contractual alternative to damages at law. Indeed in principle a claim for common law damages remains open in addition, if any could be proved. The clause is in reality a price adjustment clause. Although the occasion for its operation is a breach of contract, it is in no sense a secondary provision. The consideration fixed by clause 3.1 is said to be payable “[i]n consideration of the sale of the sale shares and the obligations of the sellers herein”. Those obligations of the sellers herein include the restrictive covenants. Clause 5.1 belongs with clauses 3 and 6, among the provisions which determine Cavendish’s primary obligations, i.e. those which fix the price, the manner in which the price is calculated and the conditions on which different parts of the price are payable. Its effect is that the sellers earn the consideration for their shares not only by transferring them to Cavendish, but by observing the restrictive covenants. As Burton J said [2013] 1 All ER (Comm) 787, para 59,

“the juxtaposition on the one hand of substantial delayed payment for goodwill and on the other hand a series of covenants which is intended to safeguard and protect that goodwill is of particular significance.”

75 Although clause 5.1 has no relationship, even approximate, with the measure of loss attributable to the breach, Cavendish had a legitimate interest in the observance of the restrictive covenants which extended beyond the recovery of that loss. It had an interest in measuring the price of the business to its value. The goodwill of this business was critical to its value to Cavendish, and the loyalty of Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub was critical to the goodwill. The fact that some breaches of the restrictive covenants would cause very little in the way of recoverable loss to Cavendish is therefore beside the point. As Burton J graphically observed in para 43 of his judgment, once Cavendish could no longer trust the sellers to observe the restrictive covenants, “the wolf was in the fold”. Loyalty is indivisible. Its absence in a business like this introduces a very significant business risk whose impact cannot be measured simply by reference to the known and provable consequences of particular breaches. It is clear that this business was worth considerably less to Cavendish if that risk existed than if it did not. How much less? There are no juridical standards by which to answer that question satisfactorily. We cannot know what Cavendish would have paid without the assurance of the sellers’ loyalty, even assuming that they would have bought the business at all. We cannot know whether the basic price or the maximum price fixed by clause 3.1 would have been the same if they were not adjustable in the event of breach of the restrictive covenants. We cannot know what other provisions of the agreement would have been different, or what additional provisions would have been included on that hypothesis. These are matters for negotiation, not forensic assessment (save in the rare cases where the contract or the law requires it). They were matters for the parties, who were, on both sides, sophisticated, successful and experienced commercial people bargaining on equal terms over a long period with expert legal advice and were the best judges of the degree to which each of them should recognise the proper commercial interests of the other.

76 We have already drawn attention to the fact that damages are in principle recoverable in addition to the price reduction achieved by clause 5.1. In this case, the company recovered US$500,000 from Mr Makdessi. Cavendish has abandoned any claim of their own for damages, because any loss of theirs would simply reflect the company's loss. But it would not always be so. There are hypotheses, for example that the restrictive covenants had been broken after he ceased to be a director, in which Cavendish's loss by his breach of the restrictive covenants would not have been reflective and might in principle have been recovered in addition to the reduction of the price under clause 5.1. Does any of this matter? We do not think so. Clause 5.1 is not concerned with the measure of compensation for the breach. It cannot be regarded as penal simply because damages are recoverable in addition. The real question is whether any damages have been suffered on account of the breach in circumstances where the price has been adjusted downwards on account of the same breach. As between Mr Makdessi and the company, the right of Cavendish to a price reduction cannot affect the measure or recoverability of the company's loss. It is res inter alios acta. It is an open question whether the right to a price reduction would go to abate any loss recoverable by Cavendish themselves if they had suffered any. We do not propose to resolve it on this appeal: the issue does not arise and was not argued. It is enough to note that if Cavendish's loss is not abated, that would be because the law regards Cavendish as having suffered it notwithstanding its right to the reduction. That can hardly make clause 5.1 a penalty.

77 We do not doubt that price adjustment clauses are open to abuse, and if clause 5.1 were a disguised punishment for the sellers' breach, it would make no difference that it was expressed as part of the formula for determining the consideration. But before a court can reach that conclusion, it must have some reason to do so. In this case, there is none. On the contrary, all the considerations summarised above point the other way.

78 We conclude, in agreement with Burton J, that clause 5.1 was not a penalty.

Was clause 5.6 contrary to the penalty rule?

79 Clause 5.6 gives rise to more difficult questions, but the analysis is essentially the same.

80 The purpose of requiring a defaulting shareholder to sell his retained shares was to sever the connection between the company and a major shareholder if he were to compete against it (and also, in the case of

A Mr Ghossoub, if he were to be dismissed for discreditable conduct). The severance of the connection is completed by clause 14.2, which provides that on ceasing to be a shareholder he will no longer be entitled to a seat on the board or to appoint a nominee in his place. In itself, this is not said to be objectionable. The objection is to the formula which excludes the value of goodwill from the calculation of the price. It is not and could not be suggested that the exclusion of goodwill serves to compensate for the estimated loss attributable to the breach. Any recoverable damages for the breach of the restrictive covenants will be recoverable on top of the forced sale of the defaulting shareholder's retained shares. Indeed, the effect of excluding the value of goodwill is to achieve what Mr Bloch called a "reverse sliding scale". The more trivial the effect of the breach on the value of the goodwill, the greater will be the defaulting shareholder's loss in being deprived of any goodwill element in the price.

C 81 The logic of the price formula for the sale of the retained shares under clause 5.6 is similar to that of the price adjustment achieved by clause 5.1 for the sale of the transferred shares. It reflects the reduced price which Cavendish was prepared to pay for the acquisition of the business in circumstances where it could not count on the loyalty of Mr Makdessi and/or Mr Ghossoub. We have dealt with this point in the context of clause 5.1. It also reflects the fact that with the severance of the connection between the defaulting shareholder and the company, no goodwill will in future be attributable to his role in the business. Indeed, the assumption must be that a seller in breach of the restrictive covenants may be actively engaged in undermining the goodwill attributable to his former role in the business. It is true that the severance of the connection between a defaulting shareholder and the group will not necessarily destroy the whole of the goodwill of the business which was sold to Cavendish, especially if the other seller remains loyal. But so far as the group is able to retain some or all of the goodwill built up by the defaulting shareholder in the past, that will presumably be due to the efforts of others.

E 82 In our view, the same legitimate interest which justifies clause 5.1 justifies clause 5.6 also. It was an interest in matching the price of the retained shares to the value that the sellers were contributing to the business. There is a perfectly respectable commercial case for saying that Cavendish should not be required to pay the value of goodwill in circumstances where the defaulting shareholder's efforts and connections are no longer available to the company, and indeed are being deployed to the benefit of the company's competitors, and where goodwill going forward would be attributable to the efforts and connections of others. It seems likely that clause 5.6 was expected to influence the conduct of the sellers after Cavendish's acquisition of control in a way that would benefit the company's business and its proprietors during the period when they were yoked together. To that extent it may be described as a deterrent. But that is only objectionable if it is penal, i.e. if the object was to punish. But the price formula in clause 5.6 had a legitimate function which had nothing to do with punishment and everything to do with achieving Cavendish's commercial objective in acquiring the business. And, like clause 5.1, it was part of a carefully constructed contract which had been the subject of detailed negotiations over many months between two sophisticated commercial parties, dealing with each other on an equal basis with specialist, experienced and expert legal advice. A

83 More fundamentally, a contractual provision conferring an option to acquire shares, not by way of compensation for a breach of contract but for distinct commercial reasons, belongs as it seems to us among the parties' primary obligations, even if the occasion for its operation is a breach of contract. This may be tested by asking how the penalty rule could be applied to it without making a new contract for the parties. The Court of Appeal simply treated clause 5.6 as unenforceable, and declared that Mr Makdessi was not obliged to sell his shares whether at the specified price or at all. That cannot be right, since the severance of the shareholding connection was in itself entirely legitimate, and indeed commercially sensible. If the option to acquire the retained shares is to stand, the price formula cannot be excised without substituting something else. Yet there is no juridical basis on which a different pricing formula can be imposed. There is no fall-back position at common law, as there is in the case of a damages clause. B C

84 Mr Bloch argued that this difficulty can be surmounted by granting Mr Makdessi a remedy corresponding to the one ordered by the Court of Appeal in Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026. We do not accept this. Jobson v Johnson arose out of a contract for the sale of a substantial shareholding in a football club for a consideration payable by instalments. The contract provided that in the event of default in the payment of any instalment, the purchaser would be obliged to transfer the shareholding back to the vendors at a price which was said to represent a substantial undervalue. This was a forfeiture. The purchaser would have been entitled to relief in equity if he had been in a position to pay, albeit late. The purchaser had in fact counterclaimed for such relief, but the counterclaim had been struck out on account of his failure to comply with his disclosure obligations. That left only a contention, advanced by way of defence, that the obligation to transfer back the shares was also a penalty. As briefly discussed in para 17 above, that may or may not have been an argument which was open to him, and it is unnecessary to decide that issue on this appeal. The Court of Appeal accepted the argument and held that the penalty rule could apply not only to an obligation to pay money on a breach of contract, but also to an obligation to transfer assets in that event. This gives rise to no difficulty at least in principle, in a case where the court could simply decline to enforce the penalty, leaving the innocent party to his ordinary remedies at law. That was the position in Jobson v Johnson, because the Court of Appeal construed the share transfer clause as a purely secondary obligation which was intended simply to secure the payment of the price: see pp 1031–1032, 1037 (Dillon LJ), pp 1043–1044, 1045 (Nicholls LJ). On that basis, Mr Johnson could in theory have been left to obtain judgment for the amount of the outstanding instalments and if necessary levy execution against the shares. However, we are bound to observe that this would appear to be a somewhat peculiar outcome. If the purchaser had been able to argue that he was entitled to relief from forfeiture, the court would presumably have dealt with his case on that basis and would not have considered the penalty argument at all. Accordingly, on the Court of Appeal's reasoning, as a result of his default in giving disclosure, he was able to achieve a better result than he would have done if he had given disclosure and been able to seek relief from forfeiture. D E F G H

A 85 In terms of achieving a fair commercial result, it is perhaps understandable that the Court of Appeal took the course that they did. Rather than applying the well established principles relating to penalties, they invoked the authorities on relief from forfeiture, which Mr Johnson had been prevented from claiming, and applied them to the penalty rule. They held that in equity a penalty was enforceable pro tanto, or on what
 B Nicholls LJ called a “scaled down” basis, i.e. only to the extent of any actual loss suffered by the breach. The court achieved this by offering the vendor the choice of (i) taking an order for specific performance of the re-transfer, conditional on its being ascertained that this would not overcompensate him for the non-payment of the outstanding instalments, or (ii) taking an order for the sale of the shares by the court, the outstanding instalment and interest to be paid to him out of the proceeds and the balance to be paid to the
 C defaulting purchaser. A somewhat similar approach was later taken by the High Court of Australia in Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd 247 CLR 205, which also adopted the concept of partial enforcement.

86 The difficulty about this approach was pointed out by Mason and Wilson JJ in the High Court of Australia in the AMEV-UDC case 162 CLR 170, 192–193:

D “At least since the advent of the judicature system a penalty provision has been regarded as unenforceable or, perhaps void, ab initio: Citicorp Australia Ltd v Hendry (1985) 4 NSWLR 1. In all that time it has been thought that no action could be brought on such a clause, no doubt because the courts should not lend their aid to the enforcement in any way
 E of a provision which is oppressive. However, this is not the only reason why the courts would refuse to lend their aid. In the majority of cases involving penalties, the courts, if called upon to assist in partial enforcement of the kind suggested by the appellant, would be required to undertake an unfamiliar role. They would need to rewrite the clause so as to permit the plaintiff to recover the loss he has actually sustained. Penalty clauses are not, generally speaking, so expressed as to entitle the
 F plaintiff to recover his actual loss. Instead they prescribe the payment of a sum which is exorbitant or a sum to be ascertained by reference to a formula which is not an acceptable pre-estimate of damage. In either case the court, if it were to enforce the clause, would be performing a function very different from that which it undertakes when it severs or reads down an unenforceable covenant, such as a covenant in restraint of trade. In the
 G ultimate analysis, in whatever form it be expressed, the appellant’s argument amounts to an invitation to the court to develop a new law of compensation, distinct from common law damages, which would govern the entitlement of plaintiffs who insist on the inclusion of penalty clauses in their contracts.”

H 87 Even if the course taken by the Court of Appeal in Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 had been right, it would not be available to Mr Makdessi because clause 5.6 cannot sensibly be analysed as a mere security for the performance of the restrictive covenants. But in our opinion the analysis of Mason and Wilson JJ was correct, and so far as it related to the form of relief, Jobson v Johnson was wrongly decided. In the first place, the treatment of a penalty clause as partly enforceable, although supported by some turns of phrase in old cases concerned with other issues, is contrary to consistent modern authority. So, with respect, is the treatment of its enforcement as discretionary according to the circumstances at the time of the breach. If, as the authorities show, the penal consequences of a contractual provision fall to be determined as at the time of the agreement, and a provision found to be a penalty is unenforceable, it is impossible to see how it can be enforceable on terms. Secondly, the Court of Appeal accepted that the court could not rewrite the parties' contract by specifically enforcing the re-transfer of the shares to the vendors at a higher price or enforcing the re-transfer of some only of the shares: see p 1037 (Dillon LJ) and p 1042 (Nicholls LJ). Yet that is in reality what they did, by refusing to enforce the re-transfer unless the vendor agreed to vary its effect. Third, the Court of Appeal interpreted the provision for the re-transfer of the shares as a "security" for the payment of the outstanding instalments. They placed the word "security" in inverted commas because the obligation was purely personal. But the Court of Appeal's order treated it as if it was an equitable mortgage of the shares, which it manifestly was not. It appears to us that the Court of Appeal were, as a matter of legal analysis, treating the clause in question as a forfeiture and not a penalty, and granting relief from forfeiture on appropriate terms, although in doing so they purported to be treating it as a penalty clause, because they were constrained to do so in the light of the pleadings. So far as the relief granted in Jobson v Johnson is concerned, the decision was entirely orthodox if it is treated as a forfeiture case, but it was wrong in principle if it is treated as a penalty case.

88 The Court of Appeal in this case thought clauses 5.1 and 5.6 should both be treated in the same way when it came to applying the penalty rule, and we take the same view, but, in agreement with Burton J at first instance, we consider that neither clause is avoided by the penalty rule.

The second appeal: ParkingEye v Beavis

The factual and procedural history

89 British Airways Pension Fund ("the fund") owns the Riverside Retail Park in Chelmsford. The fund leases sites on the retail park to various multiple retailers, but retains overall control of the site. There is a car park located at the retail park, and, on 25 August 2011, the fund entered into a contract with ParkingEye Ltd in respect of management services at that car park.

90 At all material times since then, ParkingEye has displayed about 20 signs at the entrance to the car park and at frequent intervals throughout it. The signs are large, prominent and legible, so that any reasonable user of the car park would be aware of their existence and nature, and would have a fair opportunity to read them if he or she wished to do so.

91 The upper 80% or so of the signs are worded and laid out substantially as follows (mostly in black print on an orange background):

"ParkingEye

"car park management

"2 hour max stay

"Customer only car park

"4 hour maximum stay for Fitness Centre Members

A “Failure to comply with the following will result in a Parking Charge of £85

- Parking limited to 2 hours (no return within 1 hour)
- Park only within marked bays
- Blue badge holders only in marked bays.”

B Below this main part of the signs in small, but legible black print on the same orange background is the following information:

“ParkingEye Ltd is solely engaged to provide a traffic space maximisation scheme. We are not responsible for the car park surface, other motor vehicles, damage or loss to or from motor vehicles or user’s safety. The parking regulations for this car park apply 24 hours a day, all year round, irrespective of the site opening hours. Parking is at the absolute discretion of the site. By parking within the car park, motorists agree to comply with the car park regulations. Should a motorist fail to comply with the car park regulations, the motorist accepts that they are liable to pay a parking charge and that their name and address will be requested from the DVLA.

D “Parking charge information: A reduction of the parking charge is available for a period, as detailed in the parking charge notice. The reduced amount payable will not exceed £75, and the overall amount will not exceed £150 prior to any court action, after which additional costs will be incurred.”

Below that information, in somewhat larger print are the words: “This car park is private property.” At the very bottom of the signs on a black background is ParkingEye’s name, telephone number and address in orange, and a drawing of a padlock, a drawing of a surveillance camera with the words “car park monitored by ANPR systems” in small letters underneath, and two logos recording that ParkingEye was a member of the British Parking Association (“BPA”) and that it was a BPA “approved operator”.

F 92 At 2.29 on the afternoon of 15 April 2013, Mr Beavis drove his motor car into the car park and parked it there. He did not leave until two hours 56 minutes later, thereby overstaying the two-hour limit by nearly an hour. ParkingEye obtained Mr Beavis’s name and address from the Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency (“DVLA”), and sent him a standard “First Parking Charge Notice” which demanded that he pay the £85 charge within 28 days, but stated that, if he paid within 14 days, the charge would be reduced to £50. The notice also informed him of an appeals procedure.

G Mr Beavis ignored this demand, as well as a subsequent standard form reminder notice and warning letter. ParkingEye then began proceedings in the County Court to recover the £85 alleged to be due. A claim of this size would normally have been dealt with by a district judge under the small claims procedure, but it was recognised that the case raised some points of principle which were likely to affect many other similar claims, so it was heard by the Designated Civil Judge for East Anglia.

H 93 Before Judge Moloney QC and before the Court of Appeal, Mr Beavis raised two arguments as to why he should not have to pay the £85 charge, namely that it was (i) unenforceable at common law because it is a penalty, and/or (ii) unfair and therefore unenforceable by virtue of the 1999 Regulations. The Court of Appeal (Moore-Bick, Patten LJ and Sir Timothy Lloyd) [2015] RTR 27 upheld Judge Moloney QC’s decision rejecting each of his arguments. Mr Beavis now appeals to this court, maintaining both his arguments. A

Introductory

94 It was common ground before the Court of Appeal, and is common ground in this court, that on the facts which we have just summarised there was a contract between Mr Beavis and ParkingEye. Mr Beavis had a contractual licence to park his car in the retail park on the terms of the notice posted at the entrance, which he accepted by entering the site. Those terms were that he would stay for not more than two hours, that he would park only within the marked bays, that he would not park in bays reserved for blue badge holders, and that on breach of any of those terms he would pay £85. Moore-Bick LJ in the Court of Appeal was inclined to doubt this analysis, and at one stage so were we. But, on reflection, we think that it is correct. The £85 is described in the notice as a “parking charge”, but no one suggests that that label is conclusive. In our view it was not, as a matter of contractual analysis, a charge for the right to park, nor was it a charge for the right to overstay the two-hour limit. Not only is the £85 payable on certain breaches which may occur within the two-hour free parking period, but there is no fixed period of time for which the motorist is permitted to stay after the two hours have expired, for which the £85 could be regarded as consideration. The licence having been terminated under its terms after two hours, the presence of the car would have constituted a trespass from that point on. In the circumstances, the £85 can only be regarded as a charge for contravening the terms of the contractual licence. B

95 Schemes of this kind (including a significant discount on prompt payment after the first demand) are common in the United Kingdom. Some are operated by private landowners, some by parking management companies like ParkingEye, and some by local authorities. They are subject to a measure of indirect regulation. Under section 54 of the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012, parked cars may not be immobilised or towed away by a private operator, but section 56 and Schedule 4 provide for the recovery of parking charges. Where a motorist becomes liable by contract for a “sum in the nature of a fee or charge” or in tort for a “sum in the nature of damages”, there is a right under certain conditions to recover it: Schedule 4, paragraph 4. One of those conditions is that the keeper’s details must have been supplied by the Secretary of State in response to an application for the information: ibid, paragraph 11. The Secretary of State’s functions in relation to the provision of this information are performed by the DVLA. Under paragraph 27(1)(e) of the Road Vehicles (Registration and Licensing) Regulations 2002 (SI 2002/2742), the Secretary of State is empowered to make available particulars in the vehicle register to anyone who “has reasonable cause for wanting the particulars to be made available to him”. Since 2007, the policy of the Secretary of State has been to disclose the information for parking enforcement purposes only to members of an accredited trade association. The criteria for accreditation were stated in Parliament to include the existence of “a clear and enforced code of conduct (for example relating to conduct, parking charge signage, charge levels, appeals procedure, approval of ticket wording and appropriate pursuit of penalties”): Hansard (HC Debates), 24 July 2006, col 95WS. E
H

A 96 As at April 2013, there was only one relevant accredited trade association, the BPA, to which reference was made on the notice, and to which ParkingEye still belongs. The BPA Code of Practice is a detailed code of regulation governing signs, charges and enforcement procedures. Clause 13 deals with grace periods. Clause 13.4 provides:

B “13.4 You should allow the driver a reasonable period to leave the private car park after the parking contract has ended, before you take enforcement action.”

Clause 19 provides:

C “19.5 If the parking charge that the driver is being asked to pay is for a breach of contract or act of trespass, this charge must be based on the genuine pre-estimate of loss that you suffer. We would not expect this amount to be more than £100. If the charge is more than this, operators must be able to justify the amount in advance.

D “19.6 If your parking charge is based on a contractually agreed sum, that charge cannot be punitive or unreasonable. If it is more than the recommended amount in 19.5 and is not justified in advance, it could lead to an investigation by the Office of Fair Trading.”

E The maximum of £100 recommended by the BPA may be compared with the penalties charged by local authorities, which are regulated by statute. The Civil Enforcement of Parking Contraventions (Guidelines on Levels of Charges) (England) Order 2007 (SI 2007/3487) lays down guidelines for the level of penalties outside Greater London. For “higher level contraventions” (essentially unauthorised on-street parking), the recommended penalty is capped at £70 and for other contraventions at £50. The corresponding figures for Greater London are £130 and £80.

Parking charges and the penalty rule

F 97 ParkingEye concedes that the £85 is payable on a breach of contract, and that it is not a pre-estimate of damages. As it was not the owner of the car park, ParkingEye could not recover damages, unless it was in possession, in which case it may be able to recover a small amount of damages for trespass. This is because it lost nothing by the unauthorised use resulting from Mr Beavis overstaying. On the contrary, at least if the £85 is payable, it gains by the unauthorised use, since its revenues are wholly derived from the charges for breach of the terms. The notice at the entrance describes
G ParkingEye as being engaged to provide a “traffic space maximisation scheme”, which is an exact description of its function. In the agreed statement of facts and issues, the parties state that “the predominant purpose of the parking charge was to deter motorists from overstaying”, and that the landowner’s objectives include the following:

H “(a) the need to provide parking spaces for their commercial tenants’ prospective customers; (b) the desirability of that parking being free so as to attract customers; (c) the need to ensure a reasonable turnover of that parking so as to increase the potential number of such customers; (d) the related need to prevent ‘misuse’ of the parking for purposes unconnected with the tenants’ business, for example by commuters going to work or shoppers going to off-park premises; and (e) the desirability of running that parking scheme at no cost, or ideally some profit, to themselves.” A

98 Against this background, it can be seen that the £85 charge had two main objects. One was to manage the efficient use of parking space in the interests of the retail outlets, and of the users of those outlets who wish to find spaces in which to park their cars. This was to be achieved by deterring commuters or other long-stay motorists from occupying parking spaces for long periods or engaging in other inconsiderate parking practices, thereby reducing the space available to other members of the public, in particular the customers of the retail outlets. The other purpose was to provide an income stream to enable ParkingEye to meet the costs of operating the scheme and make a profit from its services, without which those services would not be available. These two objectives appear to us to be perfectly reasonable in themselves. Subject to the penalty rule and the Regulations, the imposition of a charge to deter overstayers is a reasonable mode of achieving them. Indeed, once it is resolved to allow up to two hours free parking, it is difficult to see how else those objectives could be achieved. B C

99 In our opinion, while the penalty rule is plainly engaged, the £85 charge is not a penalty. The reason is that although ParkingEye was not liable to suffer loss as a result of overstaying motorists, it had a legitimate interest in charging them which extended beyond the recovery of any loss. The scheme in operation here (and in many similar car parks) is that the landowner authorises ParkingEye to control access to the car park and to impose the agreed charges, with a view to managing the car park in the interests of the retail outlets, their customers and the public at large. That is an interest of the landowners because (i) they receive a fee from ParkingEye for the right to operate the scheme, and (ii) they lease sites on the retail park to various retailers, for whom the availability of customer parking was a valuable facility. It is an interest of ParkingEye, because it sells its services as the managers of such schemes and meets the costs of doing so from charges for breach of the terms (and if the scheme was run directly by the landowners, the analysis would be no different). As we have pointed out, deterrence is not penal if there is a legitimate interest in influencing the conduct of the contracting party which is not satisfied by the mere right to recover damages for breach of contract. Mr Butcher QC, who appeared for the Consumers’ Association (interveners), submitted that because ParkingEye was the contracting party its interest was the only one which could count. For the reason which we have given, ParkingEye had a sufficient interest even if that submission be correct. But in our opinion it is not correct. The penal character of this scheme cannot depend on whether the landowner operates it himself or employs a contractor like ParkingEye to operate it. The motorist would not know or care what if any interest the operator has in the land, or what relationship it has with the landowner if it has no interest. This conclusion is reinforced when one bears in mind that the question whether a contractual provision is a penalty turns on the construction of the contract, which cannot normally turn on facts not recorded in the contract unless they are known, or could reasonably be known, to both parties. D E F G H

100 None of this means that ParkingEye could charge overstayers whatever it liked. It could not charge a sum which would be out of all

- A proportion to its interest or that of the landowner for whom it is providing the service. But there is no reason to suppose that £85 is out of all proportion to its interests. The trial judge, Judge Moloney QC, found that the £85 charge was neither extravagant nor unconscionable having regard to the level of charges imposed by local authorities for overstaying in car parks on public land. The Court of Appeal agreed and so do we. It is higher than
- B the penalty that a motorist would have had to pay for overstaying in an on-street parking space or a local authority car park. But a local authority would not necessarily allow two hours of free parking, and in any event the difference is not substantial. The charge is less than the maximum above which members of the BPA must justify their charges under their code of practice. The charge is prominently displayed in large letters at the entrance to the car park and at frequent intervals within it. The mere fact that many
- C motorists regularly use the car park knowing of the charge is some evidence of its reasonableness. They are not constrained to use this car park as opposed to other parking facilities provided by local authorities, Network Rail, commercial car park contractors or other private landowners. They must regard the risk of having to pay £85 for overstaying as an acceptable price for the convenience of parking there. The observations of Lord
- D Browne-Wilkinson in the Workers Trust case [1993] AC 573, 580 referred to in para 35 above are in point. While not necessarily conclusive, the fact that ParkingEye's payment structure in its car parks (free for two hours and then a relatively substantial sum for overstaying) and the actual level of charge for overstaying (£85) are common in the UK provides support for the proposition that the charge in question is not a penalty. No other evidence was furnished by Mr Beavis to show that the charge was excessive.
- E 101 We conclude, in agreement with the courts below, that the charge imposed on Mr Beavis was not a penalty.

Parking charges and the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999

- F 102 The 1999 Regulations subject the terms of consumer contracts to a fairness test. An unfair term is not binding on a consumer: regulation 8(1). The fairness test is not applicable to all terms in consumer contracts. It does not apply to certain core terms, namely those which define the "main subject matter of the contract" nor to the adequacy of the price or remuneration for the goods or services supplied: regulation 6(2). But it follows from the fact that the £85 charge is a charge for acting in breach of the primary terms that it is not excluded from the fairness test under either of these heads. The issue
- G is therefore whether the test is satisfied.
- 103 Under regulation 5(1), a contractual term which has not been individually negotiated:

"shall be regarded as unfair if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes a significant imbalance in the parties' rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer."

- H Regulation 6(1) provides that:

"the unfairness of a contractual term shall be assessed, taking into account the nature of the goods or services for which the contract was concluded and by referring, at the time of conclusion of the contract, to all the circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract and to all the other terms of the contract or of another contract on which it is dependent.”

An “indicative and non-exhaustive” list of terms which “may” be regarded as unfair by this test is contained in Schedule 2. This includes at paragraph 1(e) a term “requiring any consumer who fails to fulfil his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation”.

104 In our opinion, the same considerations which show that the £85 charge is not a penalty, demonstrate that it is not unfair for the purpose of the Regulations.

105 The reason is that although it arguably falls within the illustrative description of potentially unfair terms at paragraph 1(e) of Schedule 2 to the Regulations, it is not within the basic test for unfairness in regulations 5(1) and 6(1). The Regulations give effect to Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts (OJ 1993 L95, p 29), and these rather opaque provisions are lifted word for word from articles 3 and 4 of the Directive. The effect of the Regulations was considered by the House of Lords in Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2002] 1 AC 481. But it is sufficient now to refer to Aziz v Caixa d’Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770, which is the leading case on the topic in the Court of Justice of the European Union. The Aziz case was a reference from a Spanish court seeking guidance on the criteria for determining the fairness of three provisions in a loan agreement. They provided for (i) the acceleration of the repayment schedule in the event of the borrower’s default, (ii) the charging of default interest, and (iii) the unilateral certification by the lender of the amount due for the purpose of legal proceedings. The judgment of the Court of Justice is authority for the following propositions:

(1) The test of “significant imbalance” and “good faith” in article 3 of the Directive (regulation 5(1) of the 1999 Regulations) “merely defines in a general way the factors that render unfair a contractual term that has not been individually negotiated”: para 67. A significant element of judgment is left to the national court, to exercise in the light of the circumstances of each case.

(2) The question whether there is a “significant imbalance in the parties’ rights” depends mainly on whether the consumer is being deprived of an advantage which he would enjoy under national law in the absence of the contractual provision: paras 68, 75. In other words, this element of the test is concerned with provisions derogating from the legal position of the consumer under national law.

(3) However, a provision derogating from the legal position of the consumer under national law will not necessarily be treated as unfair. The imbalance must arise “contrary to the requirement of good faith”. That will depend on “whether the seller or supplier, dealing fairly and equitably with the consumer, could reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed to such a term in individual contract negotiations”: para 69.

(4) The national court is required by article 4 of the Directive (regulation 6(1) of the 1999 Regulations) to take account of, among other things, the nature of the goods or services supplied under the contract. This

- A includes the significance, purpose and practical effect of the term in question, and whether it is “appropriate for securing the attainment of the objectives pursued by it in the member state concerned and does not go beyond what is necessary to achieve them”: paras 71–74. In the case of a provision whose operation is conditional on the consumer’s breach of another term of the contract, it is necessary to assess the importance of the latter term in the contractual relationship.
- B 106 In its judgment, the Court of Justice drew heavily on the opinion of Advocate General Kokott, specifically endorsing her analysis at a number of points. That analysis, which is in the nature of things more expansive than the court’s, repays careful study. In the Advocate General’s view, the requirement that the “significant imbalance” should be contrary to good faith was included in order to limit the Directive’s inroads into the principle
- C of freedom of contract. “It is recognised,” she said, “that in many cases parties have a legitimate interest in organising their contractual relations in a manner which derogates from the [rules of national law]”: point AG73. In determining whether the seller could reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed to the relevant term in a negotiation, it is important to consider a number of matters. These include, at point AG75:
- D “whether such contractual terms are common, that is to say they are used regularly in legal relations in similar contracts, or are surprising, whether there is an objective reason for the term and whether, despite the shift in the contractual balance in favour of the user of the term in relation to the substance of the term in question, the consumer is not left without protection.”
- E Advocate General Kokott returned to the question of legitimate interest when addressing default interest. She observed that a provision requiring the payment on default of a sum exceeding the damage caused, may be justified if it serves to encourage compliance with the borrower’s obligations, at point AG87:
- F “If default interest is intended merely as flat-rate compensation for damage caused by default, a default interest rate will be substantially excessive if it is much higher than the accepted actual damage caused by default. It is clear, however, that a high default interest rate motivates the debtor not to default on his contractual obligations and to rectify quickly any default which has already occurred. If default interest under national law is intended to encourage observance of the agreement and thus the maintenance of payment behaviour, it should be regarded as unfair only if
- G it is much higher than is necessary to achieve that aim.”
- Finally, the Advocate General observes that the impact of a term alleged to be unfair must be examined broadly and from both sides. Provisions favouring the lender may indirectly serve the interest of the borrower also, for example by making loans more readily available: point AG94.
- H 107 In our opinion the term imposing the £85 charge was not unfair. The term does not exclude any right which the consumer may be said to enjoy under the general law or by statute. But it may fairly be said that in the absence of agreement on the charge, Mr Beavis would not have been liable to ParkingEye. He would have been liable to the landowner in tort for trespass, but that liability would have been limited to the occupation value of the parking space. To that extent there was an imbalance in the parties' rights. But it did not arise "contrary to the requirement of good faith", because ParkingEye and the landlord to whom ParkingEye was providing the service had a legitimate interest in imposing a liability on Mr Beavis in excess of the damages that would have been recoverable at common law. ParkingEye had an interest in inducing him to observe the two-hour limit in order to enable customers of the retail outlets and other members of the public to use the available parking space. To echo the observations of the Advocate General at point AG94 of her opinion, charging overstayers £85 underpinned a business model which enabled members of the public to park free of charge for two hours. This was fundamental to the contractual relationship created by Mr Beavis's acceptance of the terms of the notice, whose whole object was the efficient management of the car park. It was an interest of exactly the kind envisaged by the Advocate General at point AG87 of her opinion and by the Court of Justice at para 74 of the judgment. There is no reason to regard the amount of the charge as any higher than was that objective.

108 Could ParkingEye, "dealing fairly and equitably with the consumer, . . . reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed to such a term in individual contract negotiations"? The concept of a negotiated agreement to enter a car park is somewhat artificial, but it is perfectly workable provided that one bears in mind that the test, as Advocate General Kokott pointed out in the Aziz case, at point AG75, is objective. The question is not whether Mr Beavis himself would in fact have agreed to the term imposing the £85 charge in a negotiation, but whether a reasonable motorist in his position would have done so. In our view a reasonable motorist would have agreed. In the first place, motorists generally and Mr Beavis in particular did accept it. In the case of non-negotiated standard terms that would not ordinarily be entitled to much weight. But although the terms, like all standard contracts, were presented to motorists on a take it or leave it basis, they could not have been briefer, simpler or more prominently proclaimed. If you park here and stay more than two hours, you will pay £85. Motorists could hardly avoid reading the notice and were under no pressure to accept its terms.

109 Objectively, they had every reason to do so. They were being allowed two hours of free parking. In return they had to accept the risk of being charged £85 if they overstayed. Overstaying penalties are, as we have mentioned, both a normal feature of parking contracts on public and on private land, and important for the efficient management of the space in the interests of the general body of users and the neighbouring outlets which they may frequent. They are beneficial not just to ParkingEye, the landowner and the retail outlets, but to the motorists themselves, because they make parking space available to them which might otherwise be clogged up with commuters and other long-stay users. The amount of the charge was not exorbitant in comparison to the general level of penalties imposed for parking infractions. Nor is there any reason to think that it was higher than necessary to ensure considerate use by motorists of the available space. And, while we accept Mr Butcher's submission that the fact that the £85 charge is broadly comparable to charges levied by local authorities for parking in public car parks is not enough to show that it was levied in good faith, it is none the less a factor which assists ParkingEye in that connection. The risk of having to pay it was wholly under the motorist's own control.

A All that he needed was a watch. In our opinion, a hypothetical reasonable motorist would have agreed to objectively reasonable terms, and these terms are objectively reasonable.

I10 It is right to mention three further arguments which were raised by Mr de Waal QC on behalf of Mr Beavis to support his case that the £85 charge was unfair, and which we have not so far specifically addressed.

B I11 First, Mr de Waal relied on the fact that it was payable by a motorist who overstayed even by a minute. The Consumers' Association expanded on this point by observing that there are many reasons why a motorist may overstay, some of which may be due to unforeseen circumstances. We cannot accept this. ParkingEye's business model could have had a graduated charge for overstayers based on how long they overstayed, but the fact that it did not do so does not render it unfair. Even if
C it had done, it would presumably have involved a specific sum for each hour or part of an hour, in which case the same complaint could be made. More fundamentally, as we have explained, the £85 charge for overstayers was not a payment for being permitted to park after the two hours had expired: it was a sum imposed for staying for more than two hours. The notion of a single sum between £50 and £100 for overstaying even by a minute, appears
D to be a very common practice, in that it is adopted by many, probably the majority of, public and private car park operators. As for the suggestion that the overstay may have arisen from unforeseen circumstances, we find it hard to regard that as relevant. The object of the £85 charge is simply to influence the behaviour of motorists by causing them to leave within two hours. It is reasonable that the risk of exceeding it should rest with the motorist, who is in a position to organise his time as he sees fit. There are many
E circumstances in life when the only way of being on time is to allow for contingency and arrive early. This is accepted by every motorist who uses metered on-street parking while shopping. The legal basis on which he is made liable for overstaying penalties is of course different in that case. It is statutory and not contractual. But the underlying rationale and justification is precisely the same, namely to ration scarce parking space. It is right to add
F that, as communicated to any overstayer from whom the charge is demanded, ParkingEye has an appeals procedure, and the BPA Code of Practice provides at paragraph 13.4 for a reasonable grace period after the expiry of the fixed parking period. The appeals procedure provides a degree of protection for any overstayer, who would be able to cite any special circumstances as a reason for avoiding the charge. And, while the Code of Practice is not a contractual document, it is in practice binding on the G operator since its existence and observance is a condition of his ability to obtain details of the registered keeper from the DVLA. In assessing the fairness of a term, it cannot be right to ignore the regulatory framework which determines how and in what circumstances it may be enforced.

I12 The second argument which should be mentioned is that the £85 charge for overstayers "takes advantage of the consumer's requirement to park in that particular place to shop or visit a particular location". If this car
H park is unusually attractively located for shoppers and others, the evidence shows that the £85 charge has not been fixed at a particularly high level to reflect that fact. Further, as Mr Kirk QC pointed out on behalf of ParkingEye, it is equally true that the consumer gets the benefit of free parking in that unusually attractively located car park for two hours, and, save in unusual circumstances, it is entirely within his or her control whether the two-hour limit is exceeded. And if the consumer considers that the circumstances are unusual, he or she can invoke the appeals procedure. A

113 Finally, Mr de Waal submitted that it was unfair to make the minority who contravene the parking rules bear the whole cost of running the car park. In our view, if the £85 charge is itself such as a reasonable motorist would accept, the mere imbalance between the position of those who comply and those who do not cannot possibly make the charge unfair. It arises only because both categories are allowed two hours of free parking, and because the great majority of users of the car park (more than 99.5%, we were told) observe the rules. B

114 Accordingly, we agree with the courts below that the £85 charge in this case does not infringe the 1999 Regulations. C

Conclusion on the two appeals

115 For these reasons, we would allow the appeal in Cavendish v Makdessi and dismiss the appeal in ParkingEye v Beavis, and we would declare that none of the terms impugned on the two appeals contravenes the penalty rule, and that the charge in issue in ParkingEye v Beavis does not infringe the 1999 Regulations. D

LORD MANCE JSC

Introduction

116 These two appeals raise wide ranging and difficult questions about the current law governing contractual penalties. The cases lie at opposite ends of a financial spectrum. In the first, the appellant, Cavendish Square Holding BV (“Cavendish”), is part of the world’s leading marketing communications group (“WPP”), while the respondent, Mr Talal El Makdessi, was co-founder and co-owner with Mr Joseph Ghossoub of the Middle East’s largest advertising and marketing communications group (“the group”). Prior to 2008 WPP held 12.6% of the shares of the group. In 2008 Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub agreed to sell to Cavendish a further 47.4% of the group’s shares (in the form of an interest in Team Y & R Holdings Hong Kong Ltd (“Team”), a holding company set up to facilitate the transaction). E

117 The transaction was effected by a sale and purchase agreement dated 28 February 2008, whereby Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub agreed to make the 47.4% shareholding available in the ratio of 53.88% to 46.12%. The price was payable in stages: US$65.5m (Mr Makdessi’s share being 53.88%) was payable on completion of the sale and group reorganisation. Thereafter, there were to be interim and final payments derived from a multiple of the group’s audited consolidated operating profit (“OPAT”) between respectively 2007 and 2009 and 2007 and 2011. Clause 11.2 was a clause prohibiting Mr Makdessi from various competitive or potentially competitive activity. Clauses 5.1 and 5.6 provided that, if he breached clause 11.2, he would not be entitled to receive the interim and/or final payments, and could be required to sell Cavendish the rest of his shares at a “defaulting shareholder option price”, based on asset value and so ignoring any goodwill value. Mr Makdessi also became non-executive chair of Team F
H

A with a service agreement binding him to remain in position for at least 18 months.

B 118 It is accepted by Mr Makdessi that he did subsequently breach clause 11.2, and was thereby also in breach of fiduciary duty towards Team. The present proceedings were initiated by both Cavendish and Team. Team’s claim was settled in October 2012 when it accepted a Part 36 payment of US$500,000 made by Mr Makdessi. Cavendish’s claim is for declarations that Mr Makdessi’s breach of clause 11.2 means that clauses 5.1 and 5.6 now have the effect stated in the previous paragraph. Mr Makdessi maintains that they are unenforceable penalty clauses.

C 119 In the second case, the appellant, Mr Beavis, was the owner and driver of a vehicle which he parked in a retail shopping car park adjacent to Chelmsford railway station. The owner of the retail site and car park, British Airways Pension Fund (“BAPF”), had engaged ParkingEye Ltd, the respondent, to provide “a traffic space maximisation scheme”. The scheme involved the erection at the entrance to and throughout the car part of prominent notices, including the injunctions “2 hour max stay” and “Parking limited to 2 hours”, coupled with the further notice “Failure to comply . . . will result in a Parking Charge of £85”. Underneath, it also stated: “By parking within the car park, motorists agree to comply with the car park regulations.” Mr Beavis left his car parked for 56 minutes over a permitted two-hour period. He maintains that the £85 charge demanded of him by ParkingEye (reducible to £50 if he had paid within 14 days) is an unenforceable penalty. Further or alternatively, he maintains that it is unfair and invalid within the meaning of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999.

E 120 Cavendish succeeded before Burton J on 14 December 2012 [2013] 1 All ER (Comm) 787, although only on condition that it agreed to credit Mr Makdessi with the US$500,000 recovered from him by Team. The Court of Appeal (Patten, Tomlinson and Christopher Clarke LJJ) [2014] 2 All ER (Comm) 125 overruled Burton J on 26 November 2013, holding both clauses to be unenforceable penalties. The court held however that the judge had had, on his view of the case, no basis to impose a condition that Cavendish agree to credit Mr Makdessi with the US$500,000 (and the contrary has not been suggested before the Supreme Court). Mr Beavis has so far failed at both instances, before Judge Moloney QC on 19 May 2014 and the Court of Appeal (Moore-Bick, Patten LJJ and Sir Timothy Lloyd) [2015] RTR 27 on 23 April 2015. The appellants in both cases now appeal with the permission of the Supreme Court in the case of Mr Makdessi and of the Court of Appeal in the case of Mr Beavis.

Cavendish v Mr Makdessi—facts

H 121 I can summarise and take the relevant terms of the sale and purchase agreement to which Cavendish and Mr Makdessi were parties from the agreed statement of facts and issues (“SFI”):

“10. By clause 2.1 of the agreement, Joe [Ghossoub] and the defendant (defined as ‘the sellers’) agreed to sell 47.4% of the shareholding in the company. Clause 3 set out the consideration for that sale, which pursuant to Schedule 1 was to be shared between the defendant and Joe in shares of

53.88% and 46.12% respectively. The consideration, payment of which was not expressed to be subject to any condition, was as follows:

“(1) A payment of US$34,000,000 on completion;

“(2) A second payment of US$31,500,000 to be paid into escrow on completion and released to Joe and the defendant in accordance with clauses 3.6 to 3.12 (which in short provided for the sum to become payable in stages as the various restructurings provided for in the agreement took effect).

“(3) A further payment (‘the interim payment’) was to become payable on its ‘due date’ and was to be calculated as follows:

“8 x Average 2007–2009 ‘OPAT’ x 47.4% minus US$63m

“(4) A final payment (‘the final payment’) was to become payable on its ‘due date’, and was to be calculated as follows: ‘M’ x Average 2007–2011 ‘OPAT’ x 47.4% minus US$63m and the interim payment.

“11. ‘OPAT’ was defined in Schedule 12 as meaning the audited consolidated operating profit of the group, and ‘due date’ was defined as meaning 30 days after the relevant OPAT was agreed or determined. The figure ‘M’ in the definition of final payment was a figure varying between seven and ten depending on the growth of OPAT over the period 2007 to 2011.

“12. Thus the interim and final payments in essence obliged the purchaser to make further payments to Joe and the defendant calculated by reference to the group’s profitability in the years 2007 to 2011.

“13. Clause 3.2 provided that if the calculation of the interim payment or the final payment resulted in a negative figure, it was to be treated as zero and Joe and the defendant would not be required to repay any sum already paid.

“14. Clause 3.3 capped the total amount of all payments at US$147,500,000.

“15. By clause 9.1, paragraph 2.15 of Schedule 7, and Schedule 11, Joe and the defendant warranted that the net assets of the entire group, not just their share, as at 31 December 2007 were US$69,744,340.

“16. Under the agreement, therefore, a substantial part of the purchase consideration comprised goodwill: (a) the completion and second payments totalled $65.5m and were for 47.4% of the equity (47.4% of the warranted 2007 NAV being $33,058,817); (b) at its highest (assuming no decrease in NAV) some US$114.44m would be payable for goodwill ($147,500,000–$33,058,817), representing 77% of the aggregate purchase consideration.

“17. Clause 11 was entitled ‘Protection of goodwill’, and provided that: ‘11 PROTECTION OF GOODWILL 11.1 Each seller recognises the importance of the goodwill of the group to the purchaser and the WPP Group which is reflected in the price to be paid by the purchaser for [the shares]. Accordingly, each seller commits as set out in this clause 11 to ensure that the interest of each of the purchaser and the WPP Group in that goodwill is properly protected.’

“18. Clause 11.2 then set out various restrictive covenants (‘the restrictive covenants’) entered into by Joe and the defendant: ‘11.2 Until the date 24 months after the relevant date, no seller will directly or indirectly without the purchaser’s prior consent: (a) carry on or be engaged, concerned, or interested, in competition with the group, in the

A restricted activities within the prohibited area; (b) solicit or knowingly accept any orders, inquiries or business in respect of the restricted activities in the prohibited area from any client; (c) divert away from any group company any orders, inquiries or business in respect of the restricted activities from any client; or (d) employ, solicit or entice away from or endeavour to employ, solicit, or entice away from any group company any senior employee or consultant employed or engaged by that group company.’

B “19. By virtue of the definitions in Schedule 12 of the agreement, ‘restricted activities’ meant the provision of products and/or services of a competitive nature to those being provided by the group, ‘prohibited area’ meant any countries in which the group carried on the business of marketing communications and ancillary services, and ‘client’ meant any client or potential client of the group who had placed an order with the group during the past 12 months or been in discussions with the group during that period.

C “20. As to the several covenants: (a) the effect of any breach of the covenant against employing or soliciting senior employees could be less than a breach of the covenants against competitive activity; the defendant’s position is that it was likely, in many circumstances, to be markedly less; and (b) losses attributable to breaches of the covenant against solicitation could vary, the defendant says were likely to vary widely, according to the nature, extent, duration and success of the solicitation.

D “21. By clause 7.5, the defendant agreed that within four months after completion he would dispose of any shares held by him in Carat Middle East Sarl (‘Carat’) and procure that a joint venture agreement of 19 December 2003 to which Group Carat (Nederland) BV and Aegis International BV, on the one hand, and the defendant, on the other, were parties, would be terminated.

E “22. By the time of trial, the defendant had conceded that (if the restrictive covenants were enforceable) he was in breach thereof by reason of his ongoing, unpaid involvement in the affairs of Carat (‘the breach’).

F “23. It is the provisions providing for the consequences of breach which are in issue in this appeal. By reason of the breach, the defendant became a ‘defaulting shareholder’ within the meaning of the definition in Schedule 12. Clause 5.1 is headed ‘DEFAULT’ and includes two relevant provisions.

G “24. First, clause 5.1 provides that on becoming a defaulting shareholder, the defendant would not be entitled to receive the interim payment or the final payment: ‘If a seller becomes a defaulting shareholder he shall not be entitled to receive the interim payment and/or the final payment which would other than for his having become a defaulting shareholder have been paid to him and the purchaser’s obligation to make such payments shall cease.’

H “25. In money terms, the effect of this provision is that in the event of a default by the defendant, he could receive up to $44,181,600 less than would have been the case had he not acted in breach. If both sellers were to default, they could lose up to US$82m ($147.5m–$65.5m) between them.

“26. Second, clause 5.6 grants an option over the defendant’s remaining shares in the group whereby in the event that he became a defaulting shareholder, the claimant could require him to sell those remaining shares: ‘Each seller hereby grants an option to the purchaser pursuant to which, in the event that such seller becomes a defaulting shareholder, the purchaser may require such seller to sell to the purchaser (or its nominee) all (and not some only) of the shares held by that seller (the defaulting shareholder shares). The purchaser (or its nominee) shall buy and such seller shall sell with full title guarantee the defaulting shareholder shares . . . within 30 days of receipt by such seller of a notice from the purchaser exercising such option in consideration for the payment by the purchaser to such seller of the defaulting shareholder option price.’

“27. The ‘defaulting shareholder option price’ is defined in Schedule 12 as meaning the proportion of the net asset value of the company equal to the proportion of shares sold by the defaulting shareholder, a formula which excludes the value of goodwill. By clause 5.7, this could be satisfied either in cash or by issuing shares in WPP, at the absolute discretion of the claimant.

C

“28. Clause 15.1 granted the sellers a put option by which they could require the claimant to purchase all their remaining shares in the company: ‘Each seller is hereby granted an option by the purchaser pursuant to which such seller may, subject to clause 15.2, by service of an option notice in the form set out in Schedule 10 (the option notice) require the purchaser (or its nominee) to purchase from him all (and not some only) of the shares held by that seller (the option shares). The purchaser (or its nominee) shall buy and the seller shall sell with full title guarantee the option shares . . . within 30 days of receipt of the option notice in consideration for the payment when due of the price determined in accordance with clause 15.3 (the option price).’

“29. In money terms, the effect of clause 5.6 is that in so far as the retained shares of a defaulting shareholder have, at the date when he becomes a defaulting shareholder, a value which is attributable to goodwill, he will not receive it. He will not be able to exercise the put option otherwise available in 2011 and subsequent years, which would give him a price, not exceeding $75m, which reflected goodwill.

F

“30. As of the date of the agreement, the defendant was, and was bound to remain, a director for at least 18 months and was entitled to remain thereafter as long as he was a shareholder unless Cavendish considered that his outside business interests were likely to result in a material ongoing conflict with his duties as a director. For so long as he did remain a director, any breach of clause 11.2 would give rise to a cause of action for breach of fiduciary duty to the company.

“31. The agreement contained no provision which precluded the company from bringing a claim for damages for conduct rendering the respondent a defaulting shareholder.

“32. As with the agreement as a whole, these provisions were subject to negotiation and amendment between the parties.

H

“33. The structure of the agreement was typical of acquisition agreements in the marketing sector. As in this case, the vendor is typically the founder or operator of the business, and has important relationships

A with clients and key staff. If they decide to turn against the business, its success can be significantly affected, and provisions are therefore included to protect the value of the investment, and in particular the value of the goodwill represented by the vendor's existing personal relationships. The defendant fell into that category; the importance of personal relationships with clients is even stronger in the Middle East than the UK, and he had
B very strong relationships with clients and senior employees, and he was such a well known figure that if he acted against the group, it would inevitably cause it to lose value."

122 Paras 25 and 29 of this agreed summary outline the effect of clauses 5.1 and 5.6 of the sale and purchase agreement, on which Cavendish relies but which Mr Makdessi submits to be penal and unenforceable. Since
C clauses 5.1 and 5.6 operate because Mr Makdessi became a defaulting shareholder by reason of breach of clause 11.2, both clauses need to be considered with reference to the nature, scope and duration of the restrictive covenants in favour of Cavendish which clause 11.2 contains. As para 33 of the agreed summary records, the restrictive covenants represented very significant protections of the value of the goodwill which Cavendish was to D acquire. Clause 11.2 provides for such protection to continue until 24 months after the "relevant date". By Schedule 12:

"Relevant date means in respect of a seller the later of the date of termination of his employment by the group, the date that he no longer holds any shares or the date of payment of the final instalment of the option price pursuant to clause 15.5(b)."

E Clause 16.1 provided that:

"Save as otherwise expressly provided by this agreement no seller shall transfer, sell, charge, encumber or otherwise dispose of all or part of his interest in any shares."

The put option referred to in para 28 of the agreed summary was only
F exercisable by Mr Makdessi by option notice served "at any time between 1 January and 31 March in 2011 or in any subsequent year": clause 15.2. On its exercise, the option price was payable in two instalments, the second or final instalment being due "within 30 days of the agreement or final determination of OPAT for N+2": clause 15.5(b). OPAT means under Schedule 12 "the audited consolidated operating profit . . . in any 12-month
G accounting period ending 31 December". N means "the financial year in which the option notice is served": clause 15.3. N+2 thus means the year 2013, and the earliest date of full payment of any option price under clause 15 would be some date in 2014, once the OPAT for N+2 was agreed or finally determined. That would be the (earliest) relevant date, assuming that Mr Makdessi had previously determined his employment by the group
H which he was only committed to maintain for 18 months from the date of the agreement: para 30 of the agreed summary. Under the terms of the sale and purchase agreement dated 28 February 2008, Mr Makdessi was bound by the restrictive covenants for a further 24 months, i.e. until a date in 2016, some eight years after the sale and purchase agreement. There has been no challenge in this court to the reasonableness of this lengthy restriction, and it underlines the importance of goodwill to the agreement and to the buyers, Cavendish, in particular. A

ParkingEye Ltd v Beavis—facts

123 The signs exhibited at the entrance and throughout the car park are large, prominent and legible. They are worded as follows (the words down to “marked bays” all being given especial prominence): B

“ParkingEye

“car park management

“2 hour max stay

“Customer only car park

“4 hour maximum stay for Fitness Centre Members

Failure to comply with the following will result in a Parking Charge of:
£85 C

“Parking limited to 2 hours (no return within 1 hour)

“Park only within marked bays

“Blue badge holders only in marked bays

“ParkingEye Ltd is solely engaged to provide a traffic space maximisation scheme. We are not responsible for the car park surface, other motor vehicles, damage or loss to or from motor vehicles or user’s safety. The parking regulations for this car park apply 24 hours a day, all year round, irrespective of the site opening hours. Parking is at the absolute discretion of the site. By parking within the car park, motorists agree to comply with the car park regulations. Should a motorist fail to comply with the car park regulations, the motorist accepts that they are liable to pay a parking charge and that their name and address will be requested from the DVLA. Parking charge information: a reduction of the parking charge is available for a period, as detailed in the parking charge notice. The reduced amount payable will not exceed £75, and the overall amount will not exceed £150 prior to any court action, after which additional costs will be incurred. D

“This car park is private property.” E

124 ParkingEye operated the arrangements at the Chelmsford car park under a “supply agreement for car park management” made with BAPF on 25 August 2011. ParkingEye guarantees BAPF an undisclosed minimum weekly amount for the privilege, for which it appears, in practice, to have been paying BAPF about £1,000 per week. Neither BAPF nor ParkingEye makes any charge for parking by motorists who comply with the two-hour maximum stay and other regulations. So ParkingEye’s only income is from those required to pay the £85 (or reduced) charge. ParkingEye operates a number of other car parks on a similar basis. Its annual accounts for the year ended 31 August 2013 show an operating profit of over £1.6m, and a net profit after tax of about £1m, on a turnover of over £14m. F

125 Parking at the site is monitored by ParkingEye by automatic number plate recognition cameras to monitor the entry into and departure of vehicles from the car park. The cameras showed Mr Beavis’s vehicle driving into the car park at 14.29 pm on 15 April 2013 and leaving at 17.26 pm, a stay of two hours and 56 minutes. Mr Beavis admits having been the driver. ParkingEye obtained the vehicle’s registered keeper’s details from the DVLA, and sent a first parking charge notice which included statements to G

A the effect that the parking charge of £85 was payable within 28 days of the date of the notice, but would be discounted to £50 if paid within 14 days, and that there was an appeals procedure (which did not however include any power to grant discretionary relief). Mr Beavis did not pay or appeal, and the present proceedings were begun against him.

B The issues

B 126 This section of the judgment concerns the doctrine of penalties. I deal later with the issues arising under the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999: see paras 200–213 below. Miss Joanna Smith QC for Cavendish invites the Supreme Court to undertake a fundamental review of the law regarding penalties. In her submission it is outdated, incoherent and unnecessary, and should be abolished. Alternatively, it should have no place
C in relation to “commercial” contracts, by which I understand her to mean contracts at arm’s length between equally balanced parties, like Cavendish and Mr Makdessi. In the further alternative, she submits that it is or should be held to be inapplicable to any clauses other than those requiring payment of money on breach, and/or to clauses not aimed at compensating for the breach, but for which some other valid commercial reason exists.

D 127 Mr Bloch QC for Mr Makdessi resists these submissions. In his submission, the doctrine fulfils a tried and well established role, there is no impetus, let alone one based on any research or review, for its abolition or restriction and it is, on principle and authority, applicable to the types of clause in issue in this case. He submits that the law governing penalties enables and requires account to be taken of the interests intended to be
E protected by the relevant clause—a proposition that Miss Smith was in reply at first inclined to dispute, but after questioning and reflection later herself endorsed. But protection of such interests is, in Mr Bloch’s submission, subject to the overriding control that it must not be extravagant, oppressive or manifestly excessive. In his submission the present clauses are precisely that, since their effect is in the case of clause 5.1 to deprive Mr Makdessi of part of the agreed consideration, and to do so in a way which bears no
F resemblance to any loss which his breach may have caused Cavendish or the group. On the contrary, the smaller the loss it has caused, the larger the penalty effect, and vice versa. As to clause 5.6, its effect is to give Cavendish a right on any default by Mr Makdessi to force him to part with his remaining shareholding, at a price likely to be well below its actual value, again in circumstances where the difference in value in no way reflects any loss which the default may have caused Cavendish or the group, and where
G the smaller the loss caused to the group, the larger the difference in value of which Mr Makdessi is deprived.

H 128 Mr John de Waal QC for Mr Beavis, and Mr Christopher Butcher QC for the Consumers’ Association, interveners, submit that there is a dichotomy between a genuine pre-estimate and a deterrent clause, that the focus must be on the particular contractual relationship in issue, and general commercial or other considerations cannot detract from that focus or justify what would otherwise amount to a penalty. Mr Jonathan Kirk QC for ParkingEye does not challenge the existing law of penalties, but, like Miss Smith, submits that it is inapplicable to clauses not aimed at compensating for the breach, but for which some other valid (not necessarily commercial) reason exists. That, he submits, is the present case.

129 The law of penalties in this jurisdiction currently applies to contractual clauses operating on a breach of contract by the other party to the contract: see the statements to that effect by Lord Roskill in Export Credits Guarantee Department v Universal Oil Products Co [1983] 1 WLR 399, 402H, 404C (although the facts of that case were quite special). This limitation has on occasion been seen as a weakness or even as an indication of inherent fragility in the doctrine's underpinning. The High Court of Australia has quite recently addressed this aspect head-on, holding that breach is not an essential aspect of the doctrine; the essential question is whether the contract imposes a restriction from doing the particular act, reserving a payment if it is done, or whether it confers a right to do the act in return for payment of an equivalent: Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205 and Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2015] FCAFC 50 at [95].

130 The present appeals do not raise for consideration whether there should be any such extension of the doctrine, but rather whether it should be abolished or restricted, in English law. For my part, if the doctrine survives in English law, I do not see the distinction between situations of breach and non-breach as being without rational or logical underpinning. It is true that clever drafting may create apparent incongruities in particular cases. But in most cases parties know and reflect in their contracts a real distinction, legal and psychological, between what, on the one hand, a party can permissibly do and what, on the other hand, constitutes a breach and may attract a liability to damages for—or even to an injunction to restrain—the breach. In Mr Beavis's appeal, Mr de Waal also suggested that ParkingEye could have economic reasons for formulating the liability to pay £85 (or a reduced £50) as a liability for breach, rather than as a consideration payable for parking for longer than two hours. As a consideration, he suggested, it would have attracted VAT and ParkingEye could furthermore have incurred liability for rates as a person in beneficial occupation of the car park.

The concept of a penalty

131 The doctrine of penalties is commonly expressed as involving a dichotomy between compensatory and deterrent clauses. In Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1446H–1447A, Diplock LJ even expressed the doctrine in terms of a rule of public policy that did not “permit a party to a contract to recover in an action a sum greater than the measure of damages to which he would be entitled at common law”. All three of the early 20th century decisions of highest jurisdictions which together constitute the origin of the modern doctrine contain dicta suggestive of a mutually exclusive dichotomy. But all three show that there is no requirement that the measure of damages at common law should be ascertainable—indeed that an inability to ascertain this can justify an agreement to pay a fixed sum on breach. In this connection, they point to a broad understanding of the interests which can justify such an agreement. All three decisions must also be read in context, which involved interests different from those relevant on the present appeals.

132 In the first decision, the Scottish appeal of Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, the House was concerned with an expressed “penalty” of £500 per week for late delivery of four torpedo boats to the Spanish Government. The Earl of

A Halsbury LC distinguished at p 10 between an agreed sum for damages and a penalty to be held over the other party in terrorem and Lord Davey at p 15 between a clause providing for liquidate damages or for a punishment irrespective of the damage caused. But the Earl of Halsbury LC went on to stress how “extremely complex, difficult, and expensive” any proof of damages would have been, how it would involve “before one’s mind the whole administration of the Spanish Navy” and how “absolutely idle and impossible [it would be] to enter into a question of that sort unless you had some kind of agreement between the parties as to what was the real measure of damages which ought to be applied”: pp 11–12. He also rejected out of hand submissions that a warship has no value at all, and that, had the torpedo boats been delivered on time, they would have been sunk, like much else of the Spanish fleet, in the Spanish-American war (of 1898, after the United States intervened in support of Cuban independence).

C 133 Lord Davey and Lord Robertson indicated that they saw the ultimate question as being whether the shipbuilders had shown that the clause was exorbitant, extravagant or unconscionable to the point where it could not be regarded as commensurate with the interest protected: see pp 16 and 20. Lord Robertson encapsulated his view of the issue as follows:

D “The question remains, had the respondents no interest to protect by that clause, or was that interest palpably incommensurate with the sums agreed on? It seems to me that to put this question, in the present instance, is to answer it. Unless injury to a state is as matter of law inexpressible in money, Spain was or might be deeply interested in the early delivery of these ships and deeply injured by delay. To my thinking, Lord Moncreiff has, in two sentences, admirably stated the case: ‘The subject matter of the contracts, and the purposes for which the torpedo-boat destroyers were required, make it extremely improbable that the Spanish Government ever intended or would have agreed that there should be inquiry into, and detailed proof of, damage resulting from delay in delivery. The loss sustained by a belligerent, or an intending belligerent, owing to a contractor’s failure to furnish timeously warships or munitions of war, does not admit of precise proof or calculation; and it would be preposterous to expect that conflicting evidence of naval or military experts should be taken as to the probable effect on the suppression of the rebellion in Cuba or on the war with America of the defenders’ delay in completing and delivering those torpedo-boat destroyers.’”

G At p 19, Lord Robertson also described a penalty as a sum “merely stipulated in terrorem [which] could not possibly have formed . . . a genuine pre-estimate of the creditor’s probable or possible interest in the due performance of the principal obligation.”

H 134 Lord Robertson’s last words were quoted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council (which included the Lord Chancellor, Lord Davey and Lord Dunedin) in the second decision, Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368, 375–376. The Board’s advice was that the clause in that case was a penalty. The clause, contained in one railway construction contract, provided for the forfeiture, on non-completion of the railway within the stipulated time, of whatever retention moneys were held as a result of two separate railway construction contracts together with a further £10,000. The “determining factor” was in the Board’s advice that the sum was not a “definite sum, but is liable to great fluctuation in amount dependent on events not connected with the fulfilment of this contract”: p 376.

135 The third decision is the English appeal in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79. Under Dunlop’s standard terms, distributors undertook not to sell or offer the goods to any private customers or to any co-operative society at less than Dunlop’s current list prices, not to sell to persons whose supplies Dunlop had decided to suspend, and not to exhibit or export without Dunlop’s consent. The terms stipulated for payment of £5 for every tyre, cover, or tube sold or offered in breach of such undertakings. Dunlop’s unchallenged evidence was price cutting would indirectly damage their business as a whole: p 88. On this basis the House held that the stipulation was not a penalty.

136 Lord Dunedin said, at p 88:

“But though damage as a whole from such a practice would be certain, yet damage from any one sale would be impossible to forecast. It is just, therefore, one of those cases where it seems quite reasonable for parties to contract that they should estimate that damage at a certain figure, and provided that figure is not extravagant there would seem no reason to suspect that it is not truly a bargain to assess damages, but rather a penalty to be held in terrorem.”

137 Lord Atkinson spelled the point out at pp 91–93:

“In the sense of direct and immediate loss the appellants lose nothing by such a sale. It is the agent or dealer who loses by selling at a price less than that at which he buys, but the appellants have to look at their trade in globo, and to prevent the setting up, in reference to all their goods anywhere and everywhere, a system of injurious undercutting. The object of the appellants in making this agreement, if the substance and reality of the thing and the real nature of the transaction be looked at, would appear to be a single one, namely, to prevent the disorganization of their trading system and the consequent injury to their trade in many directions. The means of effecting this is by keeping up their price to the public to the level of their price list, this last being secured by contracting that a sum of 5l shall be paid for every one of the three classes of articles named sold or offered for sale at prices below those named on the list. The very fact that this sum is to be paid if a tyre cover or tube be merely offered for sale, though not sold, shows that it was the consequential injury to their trade due to undercutting that they had in view. They had an obvious interest to prevent this undercutting, and on the evidence it would appear to me impossible to say that that interest was incommensurate with the sum agreed to be paid.

“Their object is akin in some respects to that which a trader has in binding a former employee not to set up, or carry on, a rival business within a certain area. The trader’s object is to prevent competition, and especially to prevent his old customers whom the employee knows from being enticed away from him. If one takes for example the case of a plumber, the carrying on of the trade of a plumber may mean anything

A from mending gas pipes for a few pence apiece up to doing all the plumbing work of a big hotel. If the employee should mend one hundred of such pipes for twenty old customers at 6d apiece, for which the employer would charge 1s apiece, could it possibly be contended that the trader's loss was only one hundred sixpences, 21 10s? It is, I think, quite misleading to concentrate one's attention on the particular act or acts by which, in such cases as this, the rivalry in trade is set up, and the repute acquired by the former employee that he works cheaper and charges less than his old master, and to lose sight of the risk to the latter that old customers, once tempted to leave him, may never return to deal with him, or that business that might otherwise have come to him may be captured by his rival. The consequential injuries to the trader's business arising from each breach by the employee of his covenant cannot be measured by the direct loss in a monetary point of view on the particular transaction constituting the breach. An old customer may be as effectively enticed away from him through the medium of a 10s job done at a cheap rate as by a 50l job done at a cheap rate, or a reputation for cheap workmanship may be acquired possibly as effectively in one case as in the other." (Emphasis added.)

D 138 Lord Parker of Waddington was to like effect. After concluding that the damage likely to accrue from the breach of every stipulation to which the clause applied was the same in kind, he said, at p 99:

"Such damage will in every case consist in the disturbance or derangement of the system of distribution by means of which the appellants' goods reach the ultimate consumer."

E 139 Lord Dunedin's is the first and most cited speech in the Dunlop case. But Miss Smith is right to emphasise the importance of the other speeches. The second of four main propositions which Lord Dunedin, at p 86, thought deducible from authoritative decisions was that:

F "The essence of a penalty is a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party; the essence of liquidated damages is a genuine covenanted pre-estimate of damage (Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co v Don Jose Ramos Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6)."

G 140 Later authority has found the phrase in terrorem to be unhelpful. Lord Radcliffe commented in Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 622:

"I do not find that that description adds anything of substance to the idea conveyed by the word 'penalty' itself, and it obscures the fact that penalties may quite readily be undertaken by parties who are not in the least terrorised by the prospect of having to pay them . . ."

H 141 Lord Radcliffe's comment has been quoted with approval in the Court of Appeal in Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401 and again in Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946, paras 47 and 109, per Arden LJ and Buxton LJ. In the Cine Bes case, para 13, I regarded as a "more accessible paraphrase of the concept of penalty" that adopted by Colman J in Lordsvale Finance plc v

Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752, 762. Colman J there said that the Dunlop case showed that: A

“whether a provision is to be treated as a penalty is a matter of construction to be resolved by asking whether at the time the contract was entered into the predominant contractual function of the provision was to deter a party from breaking the contract or to compensate the innocent party for breach. That the contractual function is deterrent rather than compensatory can be deduced by comparing the amount that would be payable on breach with the loss that might be sustained if breach occurred.” B

142 Lord Dunedin’s first and third propositions [1915] AC 79, 86 were that, while the language used may be a prima facie indication as to whether a sum stipulated is a penalty, it is not conclusive; the question is one of “construction” to be decided “upon the terms and inherent circumstances of each particular contract, judged of as at the time of [its] making”. His fourth proposition had four sub-heads, identifying various tests which have been suggested to assist this task of construction and which “may prove helpful, or even conclusive”: p 87. Briefly summarised, the tests were: (a) A sum is a penalty if “extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach”. (b) If the breach consists only in not paying a sum of money, a sum stipulated as payable on the breach greater than any that ought to have been paid will be a penalty. (c) There is a presumption (but no more) that it is penalty when C D

“a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage”. E

(d) On the other hand, at pp 87–88, it is

“no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damage, that the consequences of the breach are such as to make precise pre-estimation almost an impossibility. On the contrary, that is just the situation when it is probable that pre-estimated damage was the true bargain between the parties (Clydebank case, Lord Halsbury LC, at p 11).” F

143 It is clear from these three decisions that a concern can protect a system which it operates across its whole business by imposing an undertaking on all its counterparties to respect the system, coupled with a provision requiring payment of an agreed sum in the event of any breach of such undertaking. The impossibility of measuring loss from any particular breach is a reason for upholding, not for striking down, such a provision. The qualification and safeguard is that the agreed sum must not have been extravagant, unconscionable or incommensurate with any possible interest in the maintenance of the system, this being for the party in breach to show. G

144 In 1986 the High Court of Australia thought, when examining recent English authority, that the underlying test of extravagance, exorbitance or unconscionability to be derived from the Clydebank Engineering and Dunlop cases had been eroded by decisions in which the focus had been more narrowly on a comparison between the agreed sum and H

A any possible loss which could be awarded for the breach of contract in question: AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170, 190. It advocated a return to the original concept. This was taken up by the Privy Council in Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41, where Lord Woolf emphasised the interest that parties have in being able to know with a reasonable degree of certainty the extent of their liability and the risks that they run: p 54. But both these cases accept a basic dichotomy between penal and compensatory provisions.

C 145 More recent authority suggests that this dichotomy may not be exclusive and that there may be clauses which operate on breach and which are commercially justifiable although they fall into neither category. In short, commercial interests may justify the imposition on a breach of contract of a financial burden which cannot either be related directly to loss caused by the breach or justified by reference to the impossibility of assessing such loss.

146 In the Lordsvale Finance case [1996] QB 752 Colman J was concerned with a loan agreement providing that the rate of interest would increase prospectively from the time of default in payment. He noted, at pp 763–764:

D “the borrower in default is not the same credit risk as the prospective borrower with whom the loan agreement was first negotiated. Merely for the pre-existing rate of interest to continue to accrue on the outstanding amount of the debt would not reflect the fact that the borrower no longer has a clean record. Given that money is more expensive for a less good credit risk than for a good credit risk, there would in principle seem to be no reason to deduce that a small rateable increase in interest charged prospectively upon default would have the dominant purpose of deterring default. That is not because there is in any real sense a genuine pre-estimate of loss, but because there is a good commercial reason for deducing that deterrence of breach is not the dominant contractual purpose of the term.

F “It is perfectly true that for upwards of a century the courts have been at pains to define penalties by means of distinguishing them for liquidated damages clauses. The question that has always had to be addressed is therefore whether the alleged penalty clause can pass muster as a genuine pre-estimate of loss. That is because the payment of liquidated damages is the most prevalent purpose for which an additional payment on breach might be required under a contract. However, the jurisdiction in relation to penalty clauses is concerned not primarily with the enforcement of inoffensive liquidated damages clauses but rather with protection against the effect of penalty clauses. There would therefore seem to be no reason in principle why a contractual provision the effect of which was to increase the consideration payable under an executory contract upon the happening of a default should be struck down as a penalty if the increase could in the circumstances be explained as commercially justifiable, provided always that its dominant purpose was not to deter the other party from breach.” (Emphasis added.)

G
H 147 In a whole series of cases across the world, courts have taken their cue from the Lordsvale case and held that provisions in loan agreements for uplifting the interest rate for the future after a default should not be regarded as penalties, save where the uplift is evidently extravagant: see e.g. Hong Leong Finance Ltd v Tan Gin Huay [1999] 2 SLR 153, Beil v Mansell (No 2) [2006] 2 Qd R 499, PSAL Ltd v Kellas-Sharpe [2012] QSC 31, Elberg v Fraval [2012] VSC 342, Place Concorde East Ltd Partnership v Shelter Corp of Canada Ltd (2003) 43 BLR (3d) 54 and In re Mandarin Container [2004] 3 HKLRD 554.

148 The rationale of these cases is that the default bears on the credit risk (and, as Beil v Mansell identifies, may also bear on the cost of administering the loan). The uplift is conditioned on the breach, but the breach reflects directly on the continuing appropriateness of the originally agreed interest terms. In substance, the uplift amounts to a variation of the original terms. If on the other hand, it is evident from the size of the uplift that it is in its nature a punishment for or deterrent to breach, rather than an ordinary commercial re-rating to reflect a change in risk (or administration cost), then it will still be disallowed as a penalty—as the actual decisions in Hong Leong, Beil v Mansell and Elberg v Fraval illustrate.

149 In the Cine Bes case [2004] 1 CLC 401 the Court of Appeal was concerned, inter alia, with an agreement settling litigation and granting a new licence on terms that, if the new licence was subsequently terminated for breach by the licensee, the licensor would be entitled, inter alia, to recover the costs incurred in the litigation. The court held that this was not penal. It was an “understandable and reasonable commercial condition upon which [the licensor] was prepared to dispose of the prior litigation, and to enter into the fresh licence”: para 33. If that licence had to be terminated for breach, there was, in short, no reason why the settlement terms should not be revisited. In the course of my judgment, I said, at para 15:

“I have also found valuable Colman J’s further observation[s] in Lordsvale, at pp 763G–764A, which indicate that a dichotomy between a genuine pre-estimate of damages and a penalty does not necessarily cover all the possibilities. There are clauses which may operate on breach, but which fall into neither category, and they may be commercially perfectly justifiable.”

150 In Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946, a later Court of Appeal (Arden, Clarke and Buxton LJJ) agreed with the approach taken in the Lordsvale [1996] QB 752 and Cine Bes [2004] 1 CLC 401 cases, with Clarke and Buxton LJJ stressing the importance of the commercial context, even in cases where there would be no difficulty about assessing damages (at respectively paras 105 and 118). The case concerned a clause in a chief executive’s employment contract entitling him to payment of a year’s gross salary in the event of wrongful termination of his employment without a year’s notice.

151 The dicta in para 15 in Cine Bes were considered recently by the Federal Court of Australia in Paciocco v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd [2015] FCAFC 50 at [99]. The case concerned fees charged by banks for late payment, for honour and over-limit payments and for non-payments. Allsop CJ thought that any difficulties about accepting a dichotomy could be avoided by a different analysis, which he expressed at para 103 as follows:

A “The object and purpose of the doctrine of penalties is vindicated if one considers whether the agreed sum is commensurate with the interest protected by the bargain: Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205, para 75; Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, 91–93; Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo Y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, 15–17, 19, 20; Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368, 375–376. This is not to say that the inquiry is unconnected with recoverable damages; but the question of extravagance and unconscionability by reference, as Lord Dunedin said in Dunlop, to the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach, is to be understood as reflecting the obligee’s interest in the due performance of the obligation: Comr of Public Works v Hills, at pp 375–376. One only needs to reflect on the facts of Dunlop and the justification for the payment that was found to be legitimate to appreciate these matters.”

D 152 In my opinion, the development of the law indicated by the authorities discussed in paras 145 to 151 above is a sound one. It is most easily explained on the basis that the dichotomy between the compensatory and the penal is not exclusive. There may be interests beyond the compensatory which justify the imposition on a party in breach of an additional financial burden. The maintenance of a system of trade, which only functions if all trading partners adhere to it (the Dunlop case), may itself be viewed in this light; so can terms of settlement which provide on default for payment of costs which a party was prepared to forego if the settlement was honoured (the Cine Bes case); likewise, also the revision of financial terms to match circumstances disclosed or brought about by a breach: Lordsvale and other cases. What is necessary in each case is to consider, first, whether any (and if so what) legitimate business interest is served and protected by the clause, and, second, whether, assuming such an interest to exist, the provision made for the interest is nevertheless in the circumstances extravagant, exorbitant or unconscionable. In judging what is extravagant, exorbitant or unconscionable, I consider (despite contrary expressions of view) that the extent to which the parties were negotiating at arm’s length on the basis of legal advice and had every opportunity to appreciate what they were agreeing must at least be a relevant factor.

G 153 The Federal Court of Australia in the Paciocco case (para 151 above) preferred to maintain the dichotomy between the penal and compensatory, while at the same time focusing on the “interest protected by the bargain” or the “interest in the due performance of the obligation” and on whether the sum stipulated as payable on breach is commensurate with, or extravagant or unconscionable by reference to, that interest. Provided H that “interest” protected or “in due performance” is understood widely enough to cover an interest in renegotiating the original contractual bargain in the light of the situation after or revealed by the breach, that formulation would appear to lead to the same result as reached in the cases discussed in paras 145 to 151.

Can the penalty doctrine apply to clauses withholding payments?

154 In the cases so far discussed, the provision in issue required payment of money. A number of authorities have considered whether and how far the doctrine extends beyond provisions for payment of money. First, the penalty doctrine has been applied to provisions not requiring the payment of money by, but authorising the withholding of moneys otherwise due to, the party in breach. Although the point was apparently conceded, at p 693H, several members of the House accepted this in v Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd v Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd [1974] AC 689. The clause there provided that, in the event that a sub-contractor failed “to comply with any of the conditions of this sub-contract”, the contractor might “suspend or withhold payment of any moneys due”. Lord Reid said, at p 698C–F that, read literally, this would entitle the contractor to withhold sums far in excess of any fair estimate of the value of his claims and was an unenforceable penalty, and Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest, Viscount Dilhorne and Lord Salmon spoke to similar effect: pp 703G, 711D, 723H. Hunter J adopted and applied their statements in Hong Kong in the building contract case Hsin Chong Construction Co Ltd v Hong Kong and Kowloon Wharf and Godown Co Ltd [1984] HKCFI 212 at [22]–[23].

155 In Socony Mobil Oil Co Ltd v West of England Ship Owners Mutual Insurance Association (London) Ltd (The Padre Island) (No 2) [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 239, the majority (O’Connor and Stuart-Smith LJ); Bingham LJ dissenting) would have held that, if (contrary to their holding) the mutual association’s membership rules had provided for retrospective cesser of cover on non-payment of a release call, they would have involved an unenforceable penalty. Bingham LJ’s reasoning does not rest unequivocally on a view that a withholding clause cannot constitute a penalty. He invoked considerations special to membership of a mutual insurer, namely that any loss of cover was for a period in respect of which the member was failing to pay the premium, so casting the burden of indemnity on other members: p 254. While he also relied on Daff v Midland Colliery Owners’ Mutual Indemnity Co Ltd (1913) 109 LT 418, the question whether a similar clause could, if retroactive, be invalid as a penalty was not apparently addressed by anyone in that case, and it can in those circumstances hardly suggest that the deliberate statements in the Gilbert-Ash case [1974] AC 689 were per incuriam.

156 In Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368 the Privy Council applied the penalty doctrine to a clause forfeiting, on a termination for non-completion of works, sums lodged by a contractor with the Cape Agent-General as security for its performance and for release back to it in three stages as it progressed the works. Since the sums were only lodged by way of security and were to be returned if the works progressed, the contractor could be seen to have a continuing interest in them, which the clause forfeited. More recently in Workers Trust & Merchant Bank Ltd v Dojap Investments Ltd [1993] AC 573, the Privy Council treated Comr of Public Works v Hills as authority that the doctrine applies to the forfeiture of a deposit exceeding the sum of 10% of the contract price customarily paid in respect of the sale of land. It left open the unresolved question discussed in Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 QB 476, whether the doctrine applies, or the court has any other equitable power, to address a situation where a party is given possession of property on terms that he will pay for property by

A instalments, in default of which he will forfeit any interest in the property and the instalments already paid. However, still more recently, Eder J in Cadogan Petroleum Holdings Ltd v Global Process Systems LLC [2013] 2 Lloyd's Rep 26 held the doctrine inapplicable to forfeiture of prepayments made towards the acquisition of property in the form of two gas plants. The contract provided for a series of such pre-payments, not all of which GPS completed making. It never therefore acquired the gas plants, and Cadogan
 B relied on a contractual clause forfeiting all pre-payments which GPS had made. It appears that there may be Scots authority to like effect: see Zembunt (Holdings) Ltd v Control Securities plc 1992 SC 58, although that case itself only concerned a 10% deposit.

Can the penalty doctrine apply to transfers of money's worth?

C 157 Second, the doctrine has been applied to provisions requiring the transfer, on a breach, of money "or money's worth" in the form of property belonging to the party in breach. In Watson v Noble (1885) 13 R 347, a ship owner sold seven shares in a trawler to its master for £100, and agreed to hold them on trust for him, but only for so long as he fulfil obligations as skipper which included being sober and attentive to his duties. The master
 D was later dismissed for alleged drunkenness, the owner refused to transfer the shares and the master sued to recover their price. The master succeeded on the basis that the provision for forfeiture of the shares was an unenforceable penalty. In Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 the English Court of Appeal reached the same conclusion, where shares in Southend United Football Club were transferred with part of the price payable by E deferred instalments and the contract provided for their re-transfer in the event of a failure to pay any instalment for a sum equivalent only to the first instalment, however many and whatever the value of the instalments in fact paid. Evans LJ also accepted the application of the penalty doctrine to transfers of property in Else (1982) Ltd v Parkland Holdings Ltd [1994] 1 BCLC 130, 138E-F.

F 158 There is substantial Australian authority in the same sense. In Bysouth v Shire of Blackburn and Mitcham (No 2) [1928] VLR 562, 574-575, Irvine CJ held, with Mann and Lowe JJ agreeing at p 579, that a provision for forfeiture by the council of its contractors' property in and on the works in the event of breach was penal. In Forestry Commission of New South Wales v Stefanetto (1976) 133 CLR 507, Mason and Jacobs JJ took the same view in the High Court. In Wollondilly Shire Council v Picton Power Lines Pty Ltd (1994) 33 NSWLR 551, 555G, the doctrine was applied
 G to a provision requiring the defaulting contractor to sell back property to the council at its original sale price, with Handley JA observing that, since equity looks to substance not form, the doctrine must apply to the transfer of money's worth as well as money. In Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656, the High Court of Australia cited Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 for the same proposition in relation to a clause
 H requiring a petrol station to be sold back to BP at a price excluding goodwill. The argument failed on the facts, because of expert evidence, which the trial judge accepted, that in the context of this particular station there was no monetary value attaching to any goodwill. Finally, the High Court in the Andrews case 247 CLR 205 again cited Jobson v Johnson for the proposition that the doctrine applied to the transfer of property.

159 In the Else case [1994] 1 BCLC 130 (para 157 above), the Court of Appeal was however concerned with a contract under which the seller retained the shares agreed to be sold in Sheffield United Football Club and the terms of which permitted the seller to retain half of any instalments already paid in the event that the contract was terminated for failure to pay any instalment. The court, distinguishing Jobson v Johnson as a case where property in the shares had passed, refused to extend the penalty doctrine to cover the situation before it. There would have been discretion to relieve against forfeiture in equity, but this too was refused on the ground that it was not unconscionable in the circumstances for the seller to insist on the strict terms: the purchaser had under the contract in fact already enjoyed two years as club chairman and the agreement was itself a compromise to avoid argument whether the terms of the agreement which it replaced constituted a penalty.

The relationship between the penalty doctrine and relief against forfeiture

160 Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 proceeds on the basis that a case may raise for consideration both the penalty doctrine and the power of the court to relieve against forfeiture. In my opinion, that is both logical and correct in principle under the current law. A penalty clause imposes a sanction for breach which is extravagant to the point where the court will in no circumstances enforce it according to its terms. The power to relieve against forfeiture relates to clauses which do not have that character, but which none the less operate on breach to deprive a party of an interest in a manner which would not be penal. That it would not be penal is evident from the fact that the court will only grant relief on the basis that the breach is rectified by performance. “In the ordinary course”, as the Privy Council said in Çukurova Finance International Ltd v Alfa Telecom Turkey Ltd (No 4) [2016] AC 923, 979, para 13,

“relief in equity will only be granted on the basis of conditions requiring performance, albeit late, of the contract in accordance with its terms as to principal, interest and costs: see e.g. per Lord Parker of Waddington in Kreglinger (G & C) v New Patagonia and Cold Storage Co Ltd [1914] AC 25, 49–50 and per Lord Wilberforce in Shiloh Spinners Ltd v Harding [1973] AC 691, 722C, 723H.”

The two doctrines, both originating in equity, therefore operate at different points and with different effects. Consideration whether a clause is penal occurs necessarily as a preliminary to considering whether it should be enforced, or whether relief should be granted against forfeiture.

161 This same inter-relationship between the penalty doctrine and relief against forfeiture was also assumed in BICC plc v Burndy Corpn [1985] Ch 232, where Dillon LJ, with whom Ackner LJ agreed, considered first whether the clause was a penalty, before moving to the issue of relief against forfeiture. The clause was a provision in an agreement dissolving a joint relationship, whereby certain joint patent rights would continue to be held by BICC, with Burndy paying its share of the costs of their maintenance and processing by BICC, and with a clause providing that, if either party failed to fulfil its obligations in that regard, the party not in default could require an assignment of the guilty party’s interests in the joint rights. Burndy failed to meet certain costs due, BICC claimed an assignment of Burndy’s share in the

A joint rights, to which Burndy’s first response was that the clause was in the nature of a penalty, since the value of Burndy’s share would be worth many times more than the sums unpaid or any actual loss to BICC: pp 236H–237C. The submission failed on the basis that it was “commercial sense” or a “sensible purpose” that a party failing to pay its share of the costs of processing or keeping alive a patent may be required to give up its interest (pp 246G and 247C), and that the clause was

B “no more a penalty clause than is the ordinary power of re-entry in a lease or the ordinary provision in a patent licence to enable the patentee to determine the licence, however valuable, in the event of non-payment of royalties”: p 247C–D.

C The reasoning has some of the flavour of Bingham LJ’s observations in The Padre Island (No 2) [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 239 about the mutuality existing between members of a mutual insurance association. But how far the analogies on which Dillon LJ relied are reliable in a context of forced transfer of property is a question for another case. The position regarding re-entry under a lease has long been regulated by statute, and a contractual licence raises different considerations to a requirement to transfer a proprietary share in joint rights. Be that as it may be, the case does not suggest that a forced transfer of property rights can never attract the operation of the penalty doctrine. It turned on the existence of joint rights, in the maintenance and processing of which both parties agreed to play their part.

Should the penalty doctrine be abolished or restricted?

E 162 This being the current state of authority, I come to Cavendish’s primary and secondary cases, that the penalty doctrine should be abolished, or, that failing, that it should be restricted to non-commercial cases or to cases involving payment of money. I am unable to accept either proposition. As to abolition, there would have to be shown the strongest reasons for so radical a reversal of jurisprudence which goes back over a century in its current definition and much longer in its antecedents. It has long been recognised that the situations in which the doctrine may and may not apply can involve making distinctions which can appear narrow and which follow lines which can be difficult to define. But that has never hitherto been regarded as a reason for abandoning the whole doctrine, which in its core exists to restrain exorbitant or unconscionable consequences following from breach. In 1966 Diplock LJ, after referring in the Robophone case [1966] G 1 WLR 1428, 1447 to the public policy behind the rule in the passage which I have already quoted (para 131 above), said that

“in these days when so often one party cannot satisfy his contractual hunger à la carte but only at the table d’hôte of a standard printed contract, it has certainly not outlived its usefulness.”

H 163 In 1975 the Law Commission in its Working Paper No 61, Penalty Clauses and Forfeiture of Moneys Paid, far from suggesting abolition proposed that the doctrine should be expanded, along lines now accepted in Australia by the Andrews case 247 CLR 205, to cover any situation where the object of the disputed contractual obligation is to secure the act or result which is the true result of the contract: pp 18–19. In 1999, the Scottish Law Commission in its Report on Penalty Clauses (Scot Law Com No 171) recommended that there should continue to be judicial control over contractual penalties, whatever form they take—whether payment of money or forfeiture of money or transfer or forfeiture of property. It suggested as the criterion for such control whether the penalty was “manifestly excessive” in all the circumstances when the contract was entered into. It further recommended a test of substance for determining whether a clause was a penalty and an extension along the same lines as the English Law Commission recommended in 1975. Cavendish’s submission that this court should abolish or rewrite radically the penalty doctrine is made without the benefit of the sort of research into the consequences and merits of such a step, which the Law Commission or Parliament would undertake before venturing on it.

164 There is therefore an unpromising background to Cavendish’s submission that the doctrine should be either abolished or restricted. Further, the Scottish Law Commission pointed out (para 1.8) that there has been a general convergence of approaches in European civil codes and soft law proposals towards a recognition of the utility and desirability of judicial control of disproportionately, excessively, manifestly or grossly high or unreasonable penalties. The Council of Europe Committee of Minister’s Resolution 78 (3) of 20 January 1978 Relating to Penal Clauses in Civil Law (article 7), the Principles of European Contract Law (article 9:509), the UNCITRAL Uniform Rules on Contract Clauses for an Agreed Sum Due upon Failure of Performance (article 8) and the UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts (article 7.4.13) all contain provisions for such control along such lines.

165 I note in parenthesis that many national European legal systems already appear to contain similar provisions, even if only introduced legislatively as appears to be the case in France by laws of 9 July 1975 and 11 October 1985 amending article 1152 of the Code Civil (and reversing the effect of the Cour de cassation decision in Paris frères c Dame Juillard Civ 14 February 1866). Germany in contrast takes a broad view of the interests which may be protected by a clause imposing a financial liability on breach (Vertragsstrafe), including among them not merely compensation, but also deterrence. But in non-business cases, the court has the power to reduce any penalty to an appropriate level under BGB (the Civil Code), section 343. However, HGB (the Commercial Code) section 248 exempts contracts between businessmen from the scope of BGB section 343, although such contracts appear still to be susceptible to control if they are standard form contracts (not the case with that between Cavendish and Mr Makdessi) or in terms so abusive as to infringe other principles applicable generally, although only in extreme cases, such as those governing Guten Sitten, Wucher or Treu und Glauben: BGB sections 138 and 242.

166 At the court’s request, Cavendish also included as an appendix to its case a valuable examination of the law of, and relevant academic commentary from, other common law countries: Australia, Canada, New York and other United States’ states and sources, Scotland, New Zealand, Singapore and Hong Kong. It is sufficient to say that all these countries retain a doctrine broadly on the same lines as the current English doctrine. In both Australia and Canada, emphasis has been placed on the root principles of extravagance, exorbitance or unconscionability, to be found in

A the Clydebank Engineering case [1905] AC 6 and the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79; AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin 162 CLR 170 and Elsley v JG Collins Insurance Agencies Ltd [1978] 2 SCR 916 and Waddams, The Law of Damages, looseleaf ed, (November 2014), para 8-340. In Australia, the doctrine has been extended, as I have noted, to cover situations falling short of breach: the Andrews case 247 CLR 205. In both Singapore and Hong Kong, the approach in the Philips Hong Kong case 61 BLR 41 has been followed. In Australia, it is established that the penalty doctrine applies to clauses calling for the transfer of property (para 158 above) as well as to the withholding of sums due, and there is also Hong Kong authority for the latter: para 154 above. Waddams, The Law of Contracts, 6th ed (2010), para 461 cites Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 for the proposition that it applies to clauses requiring transfer of property at an undervalue in Canada, and there is no suggestion of disagreement on either of these points in any other common law country. It would be odd, to say the least, if the United Kingdom separated itself from so general a consensus.

167 It is true that, in a European Union context measures now exist which carry some of the burden which might previously have been borne by the penalty doctrine: the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, giving effect to Directive 93/13/EEC, and the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008 (SI 2008/1277), giving effect to Parliament and Council Directive 2005/29/EC of 11 May 2005 concerning unfair business-to-consumer commercial practices (OJ 2005 L149, p 22). These are confined to consumer situations, and in the case of the former at present to contract terms which are not individually negotiated. That limitation has disappeared, with the coming into force of the Consumer Rights Act 2015 on 1 October 2015 to replace the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999, the Unfair Contract Terms Act 1977 (in relation to consumer contracts), most of the Sale of Goods Act 1979, and the Supply of Goods and Services Act 1982 (in relation to consumer contracts). It would be unsafe to assume that any of these measures makes or will make the penalty doctrine redundant. The fact that Parliament has not sought to abolish or amend the doctrine, despite their existence, is just as capable of being invoked in its favour. In any event, the doctrine protects businesses, including small businesses, which may well have a need for it.

G
168 I would reject Miss Smith's submission that the doctrine should be limited so as not to apply to "commercial" cases for similar reasons. There is no basis in authority or principle for such a limitation. It would strike at an existing protection in an area where the doctrine has been frequently invoked, including in the cases on exorbitant uplifts of loan interest on breach of loan agreements. The concept of a commercial case is also undefined and obscure, in the absence of any applicable statutory definition.

H
169 Miss Smith's further submission that the doctrine should be limited by confining unconscionability to circumstances of procedural misconduct, involving duress, undue influence, misrepresentation, or something similar would appear effectively to deprive the doctrine of any role at all, and again has no basis in authority or principle.

170 I am equally unable to accept that the doctrine should be confined to cases of payment of money. It would be absurd to draw a rigid distinction between a requirement to transfer money and property. It would also be absurd to draw such a distinction between them and the withholding of moneys due. Such uncertainties as may exist regarding the doctrine's applicability to deposits or to clauses forfeiting pre-payments must await decision in due course.

Application of the penalty doctrine—Cavendish

171 The relevant trigger to the operation of both clauses 5.1 and 5.6 is the definition of “defaulting shareholder”, to include “a seller who is in breach of clause 11.2 hereof”. Clause 11.2 contains various restrictive covenants. It is common ground (SFI para 20; para 121 above) that the breach of the covenant against employing or soliciting senior employees could be less than a breach of the covenants against competitive activity, and that losses from breaches of the covenant against solicitation could vary, according to the nature, extent, duration and success of the solicitation. Mr Makdessi would say “markedly” less and vary “widely”.

172 Two points may be made here. First, the covenants must be seen as a package designed to protect against activities, all of them aimed at competitive activity and all of them likely to be conducted in a manner difficult to detect and to be, if detected, difficult to evaluate with regard to their extent or impact. In this situation, Lord Atkinson’s words in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79, 92–93 appear to me to have resonance here:

“The object of the appellants in making this agreement, if the substance and reality of the thing and the real nature of the transaction be looked at, would appear to be a single one, namely, to prevent the disorganization of their trading system and the consequent injury to their trade in many directions . . . It is, I think, quite misleading to concentrate one’s attention upon the particular act or acts by which, in such cases as this, the rivalry in trade is set up . . . The consequential injuries to the trader’s business arising from each breach by the employee of his covenant cannot be measured by the direct loss in a monetary point of view on the particular transaction constituting the breach.”

This was said in a context where Dunlop was protecting the whole of its business, involving many actual and potential transactions with many different purchasers, by imposing trading restrictions on every purchaser. In the present case, Cavendish is protecting the whole of the business, of which it was to be majority shareholder, involving many actual and potential transactions with many different customers, by imposing a competitive restriction on the sellers from whom it was buying the majority control. In each case, the focus should be on the overall picture, not on the individual breaches.

173 Second, so far as it is said, obviously correctly, that breach of clause 11.2(d) may have consequences different from those of clauses 11.2(a) to (c), the speeches in the Dunlop case may be seen as open to different interpretations. On the one hand, the situation may be argued to fall within Lord Dunedin’s fourth proposition, para (c). On the other hand, the whole of clause 11.2 may be regarded as doing (in Lord Atkinson’s further words at p 93) “little, if anything, more than impose a single obligation”—here refraining from any potentially competitive activity. Lord Parker exposed the problems in this area to particularly detailed examination at p 98, when he described the position as:

A “more complicated when the stipulation, though still a single stipulation, is capable of being broken more than once, and in more ways than one, such as a stipulation not to solicit the customers of a firm.
A solicitation which is unsuccessful can give rise to only nominal damages, and even if it be successful, the actual damage may vary greatly according to the value of the custom which is thereby directly or B indirectly lost to the firm. Still, whatever damage there is must be the same in kind for every possible breach, and the fact that it may vary in amount for each particular breach has never been held to raise any presumption or inference that the sum agreed to be paid is a penalty, at any rate in cases where the parties have referred to it as agreed or liquidated damages. The question becomes still more complicated where C a single sum is agreed to be paid on the breach of a number of stipulations of varying importance. It is said that in such a case there arises an inference or presumption against the sum in question being in the nature of agreed damages, even though the parties have referred to it as such.
My Lords, in this respect I think a distinction should be drawn between cases in which the damage likely to accrue from each stipulation is the same in kind and cases in which the damage likely to accrue varies in kind D with each stipulation. Cases of the former class seem to me to be completely analogous to those of a single stipulation, which can be broken in various ways and with varying damage; but probably it would be difficult for the court to hold that the parties had pre-estimated the damage if they have referred to the sum payable as a penalty.

“In cases, however, of the latter class, I am inclined to think that the prima facie presumption or inference is against the parties having E pre-estimated the damage, even though the sum payable is referred to as agreed or liquidated damages. The damage likely to accrue from breaches of the various stipulations being in kind different, a separate pre-estimate in the case of each stipulation would be necessary, and it would not be very likely that the same result would be arrived at in respect of each kind of damage.”

F 174 Applying this passage, on the assumption that clause 11.2 should be regarded as containing, in Lord Parker’s words, “a number of stipulations of varying importance” I would consider that the damage likely to accrue from each such stipulation was the same in kind—being damage from competitive activity. On that basis, Lord Parker’s approach would lead to the conclusion that there was no penal presumption.

G 175 It is submitted, however, by Mr Bloch that clause 5.1 is penal for a different reason, because of the size and haphazard nature of its potential impact in forfeiting entitlement to receive the interim and/or final payments, so far as not yet paid at the time of its breach. Taking the size of impact, it is common ground that a substantial part of the purchase price comprised goodwill: SFI, para 16. This is clear from the terms of the agreement alone (especially clauses 11.1 and 11.7), but is further confirmed by the evidence of H Mr Scott for Cavendish and by the figures alone. The net assets of the entire group were, by the terms of the sale and purchase agreement, warranted by Mr Makdessi to be US$69.7m as at 31 December 2007. That indicates that in broad terms around US$33m of the US$65.5m paid to Mr Makdessi and Mr Ghossoub by way of completion and second payments was seen as attributable to the group's net asset value. Their total entitlement was capped under clause 3.3 at US$147.5m. Deducting the net asset value element of the completion and second payments, the anticipated goodwill value must have been up to US$114.5m, of which US$32.5m (about 26%) was covered by the completion and second payments, meaning that up to US$82m was anticipated to come by way of the interim and final payments, of which Mr Makdessi's 53.88% share would be some US$44m. On Cavendish's case, Mr Makdessi's breach of clause 11.2 deprives him of any claim to this or any other goodwill element of the value of his shares over and above that already covered by the completion and second payments.

176 Mr Bloch submits that this arrangement self-evidently lacks any rational connection between the severity of the breach or of its consequences and the impact of clause 5.1. A partial response to this submission is that there may be a connection as a result of the timing of the interim and/or final payments. Clause 5.1 will only result in the loss of either payment, if the breach occurs before the payment is due. The due date for each such payment is 30 days after determination of the relevant OPAT for all financial periods to which the payment relates. That would normally mean at some point in the first half of 2010 in the case of the interim period, and in the first half of 2012 in the case of the final payment. The later the breach in time, the less its impact on the group and the less likely that it would occur in time for clause 5.1 to bite.

177 That, however, amounts to a very crude link, at best. And it means that clause 5.1 is only capable of operating as any form of protection for Cavendish against breaches occurring for something over four years from the date of agreement, while clause 11.2 is capable of continuing and being broken for a much longer period of years (24 months after the relevant date, itself potentially postponed until whenever Mr Makdessi exercises the put option provided by clause 15).

178 Further, Mr Bloch can point to a respect in which the mechanism of clause 5.1 is likely to work in a quite opposite direction to any that would be expected: that is, in inverse ratio to any loss caused to the group by the breach. The earlier and greater the breach, the more likely that Mr Makdessi would be profiting by it at the expense of the group, in a way affecting the group's OPAT and so reducing the interim and final payments and the impact of their loss under clause 5.1. In contrast, a small breach with small consequences for the group at an early stage would leave the group's OPAT unaffected, and would mean that clause 5.1 had the maximum possible impact on Mr Makdessi.

179 Cavendish's response to such points is in essence that they focus too narrowly on the consequences of breach. In line with Lord Atkinson's approach in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 (paras 142 and 172 above), the focus should be not on any particular possible breach or its timing or consequences, but on the general interest being protected, and the question whether the protection which the parties agreed can be condemned as unconscionable or manifestly excessive. In this connection, Miss Smith submits that what was in substance agreed was a price formula, which reverted, understandably, in the event of breach of clause 11.2 to a basis of valuation omitting any further goodwill element. In this connection, Miss Smith drew attention to the provision in clause 3.1 stating that the agreed payments were all in consideration of "the sale of the sale shares and

A the obligations of the sellers herein”. However, I do not regard that as assisting the argument. The same could be said of any obligation triggering a penalty clause, and one might add that neither the interim nor the final payment is expressly tied to clause 11.2, although each is expressly made “subject to the provisions of clause 6”, dealing with “Calculation of OPAT and payment of the consideration”.

B 180 Cavendish’s general response none the less appears to me to have substantial force. The essence of what the parties were agreeing was that goodwill was crucial, and that there could be no further question of paying for any goodwill element of Mr Makdessi’s shares if he committed a breach of his non-competitive obligations under clause 11.2. It is true that, in the circumstances existing for at least the first 18 months after the agreement, any such breach would be actionable in damages by Team, with the result that Cavendish’s loss would in theory be made good and it could itself have had no contractual claim for damages because of the rule precluding recovery of reflective loss. But after 18 months this would not necessarily be the case, and even during the 18-month period, it is understandable that Cavendish should no longer be prepared to pay any further goodwill element, once competitive activity by Mr Makdessi had cast a doubt over the current and future value of the group’s goodwill. As with a bank loan, so here, on a much larger scale, it can be said that any such breach could and would change in a fundamental respect the risk element involved in Cavendish’s purchase of a large block of shares in the group.

E 181 On this basis, the question still remains whether clause 5.1 can and should be condemned as penal, on the grounds that it is extravagant, exorbitant or unconscionable in its nature and impact. Not without initial hesitation, and despite the powerful points made by Mr Bloch, I have come to the conclusion that, in this particular agreement made deliberately and advisedly between informed and sophisticated parties, the court should answer this question in the negative, and hold that clause 5.1 is enforceable. Its effect was to revise the basic price calculation for the shares which had been agreed to be sold, and, so viewed in the context of a carefully negotiated agreement between informed and legally advised parties at arm’s length, I do not consider it can or should be regarded as extravagant, exorbitant or unconscionable.

G 182 I turn to clause 5.6. This raises somewhat different considerations. It is a provision requiring Mr Makdessi as the party in breach to transfer property in his remaining shares against his will at a price based on net asset value alone. It is explained in terms of a desire to sever all interest from someone who has breached his contract. But it does so, first by imposing on the contract-breaker a forced deprivation of property which was not otherwise agreed to be sold under the contract broken, and second by doing this at a price which (unlike clause 5.1 which leaves the contract-breaker with a substantial element of goodwill value, under the completion and second payments) deprives him of the whole of any goodwill value attaching to such property.

H 183 I accept that a forced transfer for no consideration or for a consideration which does not reflect the value of the asset transferred may constitute a penalty within the scope of the penalty doctrine. But clause 5.6 must be viewed in nature and impact as a composite whole as well as in context. It operates as an element in a mechanism provided by clauses 5 and 11.2 for bringing to an end the continuing relationship between WPP and a defaulting shareholder. Although triggered by default, it amounts, like clause 5.1, to a reshaping of the parties' primary relationship. Had their relationship as common shareholders in the group continued, Mr Makdessi would have continued to be bound by the restrictions contained in clause 11.2, until 2016 (para 122 above), and would have had the benefit of the put option contained in clause 15. The relevant option price which Mr Makdessi could receive on his exercise of the put option provided by clause 15 would have been based again on eight times average OPAT over four years (starting with the year preceding the exercise of the option) capped at US$75m. As with the price of the shares which Mr Makdessi agreed to sell, so with the option price, the parties clearly envisaged that a price calculated on such a basis would exceed by a multiple a net asset based price. Clause 5.6 would not have made any real sense otherwise.

184 However, once Mr Makdessi breached clause 11.2, the position changed radically. It is accepted that, once such a breach occurred, it was in principle understandable that he should be required to sever any shareholding relationship completely by selling his remaining shares. But that would at the same time release him from his restrictive covenants, in view of the definition of the "relevant date", set out in para 122 above. The group without the protective benefit of the restrictive covenants would be vulnerable (potentially for many years during which it could legitimately have expected to be protected by the covenants) in a way which would clearly justify revisiting the basis on which any price for the purchase of Mr Makdessi's remaining shareholding was set. What the fortunes of the group would be, following premature severance of relations, in circumstances where it was now open to Mr Makdessi to compete as much as he wished, would be difficult, if not impossible, to predict.

185 Again, Mr Bloch submits that the clause is likely to operate in a highly random manner. A small breach committed at an early stage but of little consequence for the group's OPAT will deprive the defaulting shareholder of a large goodwill value; a large breach committed at an early stage to the defaulting shareholder's benefit will depress the goodwill value of the option shares, and cost the defaulting shareholder less. But the ultimate question is in my view whether this carefully negotiated clause, attributing a nil value to goodwill on a forced severance of shareholding relationships triggered by a breach of basic restrictive covenants, can be regarded as exorbitant or unconscionable, having regard to the completely new scenario created by any breach of the restrictive covenants. Once it is accepted, I think inevitably, that complete severance of relationships was a natural provision to include as a consequence of any such breach, I do not consider that an agreement that this should take place on a basis ignoring any goodwill which might subsist can or should be regarded as being either exorbitant or unconscionable.

186 That makes it unnecessary to consider Mr Bloch's further submissions that, if clause 5.6 was a penalty but it was in principle understandable that the parties should have agreed on severance of their shareholding relationship, Cavendish could have invited, but has not invited, any offer of the type which Dillon and Nicholls LJ in Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 considered that a contract-breaker such as Mr Makdessi could be required to make. In the present case, that would

A (presumably) be an offer to sell the remaining shares at a fair or market price. That would go further than anything that Dillon and Nicholls LJ specifically endorsed in that case. It is unnecessary to say more about this aspect of the decision in Jobson v Johnson, on which I would in an appropriate case have wished to hear further and fuller submissions.

B 187 It follows that I would allow the appeal in respect of both clauses 5.1 and 5.6.

Application of the penalty doctrine—ParkingEye Ltd v Beavis

C 188 There is common ground between all before the court that the relationship between ParkingEye and Mr Beavis was a contractual relationship, whereby Mr Beavis undertook not to park for more two hours and, on any breach of that obligation, incurred a liability of £85, reducible, in this case, to £50 if he had paid within 14 days of ParkingEye's demand.

D 189 The Court of Appeal raised a question about this analysis, which the Supreme Court also took up. But I am satisfied that it is correct in law. The terms of the signs which Mr Beavis must be taken to have accepted by conduct in entering and parking in the car park are to that effect. Mr Beavis thereby expressly agreed to stay for two hours maximum, and to comply with the other parking restrictions, such as parking within a marked bay and not using a blue badge holder's bay, and to pay the stipulated sum if he failed so to comply.

E 190 It may be suggested that Mr Beavis thereby promised nothing which can in law constitute valuable consideration. He was being given a licence, on conditions, and he would have been a trespasser if he overstayed or failed to comply with its other conditions. But ParkingEye was not in possession of the car park, or capable of bringing proceedings in trespass. It had a mere right to control parking at the site—the right to permit or refuse others to park there on such conditions as it might stipulate. By promising ParkingEye not to overstay and to comply with its other conditions, Mr Beavis gave ParkingEye a right, which it would not otherwise have had, to enforce such conditions against him in contract. Even if no parking charge had been stipulated, enforcement would still have been possible in law, even if a claim for damages or for an injunction might not in practice have been likely. With the stipulated parking charge, the nature of the intended contract is even clearer, although the question arises whether the parking charge is an unenforceable penalty. The quid pro quo provided by ParkingEye in return for Mr Beavis's promise was the grant of permission to park for up to two hours in its discretion free of charge, on conditions. Each party thus gave the other valuable consideration.

H 191 ParkingEye argued that Parliament has, by the Protection of Freedoms Act 2012, effectively recognised the legitimacy of a scheme such as theirs, in a way precluding or at least militating against any application of the penalty doctrine. The judge and the Court of Appeal [2015] RTR 27, para 28 also found some support in this Act for the view that charges of this kind are not to be regarded as unenforceable. In my view, that is a misreading of the Act. The Act merely “makes provision for the recovery of unpaid parking charges from the keeper or hirer of a vehicle” (section 56), in circumstances “where (a) the driver of a vehicle is required by virtue of a relevant obligation to pay parking charges in respect of the parking of the vehicle on relevant land; and (b) those charges have not been paid in full”:

Schedule 4, paragraph 1. The reference to a relevant “obligation” does not exclude the penalty doctrine. On the contrary, if a charge stipulated contractually is a penalty, there will be no obligation. A

192 There is nothing in the detailed definitions to affect this straightforward conclusion. Schedule 4, paragraph 2(1) provides that: “‘parking charge’— (a) in the case of a relevant obligation arising under the terms of a relevant contract, means a sum in the nature of a fee or charge, and (b) in the case of a relevant obligation arising as a result of a trespass or other tort, means a sum in the nature of damages”. “Relevant contract” is defined in wide terms including a contract which arises only on parking and is made either with the owner or occupier of the land or with someone like ParkingEye authorised by the owner or occupier to enter into a contract requiring the payment of parking charges: Schedule 4, paragraph 2(1). “Relevant obligation” means (a) an obligation arising under the terms of a relevant contract or, (b) where there is no relevant contract, as a result of a trespass or other tort committed by the parking: Schedule 4, paragraph 2(1). The reference to a “sum in the nature of damages is to a sum of which adequate notice was given to drivers of vehicles (when the vehicle was parked . . .)”: Schedule 4, paragraph 2(2). The position in tort may one day merit closer examination, since it is not clear to me on what basis, other than contractual, the driver of a vehicle can incur any obligation to pay a sum in the nature of damages as a result of a trespass or other tort, however much notice was given to him or her when the vehicle was parked. If there is such a basis, however, I have little doubt that the law would also extend the penalty doctrine to cover it. B

193 The penalty doctrine is therefore potentially applicable to the present scheme. It is necessary to identify the interests which it serves. They are in my view clear. Mr Beavis obtained an (admittedly revocable) permission to park and, importantly, agreement that if and so far as he took advantage of this it would be free of charge. ParkingEye was able to fulfil its role of providing a traffic management maximisation scheme for BAPF. The scheme met, so far as appears, BAPF’s aim of providing its retail park lessees with spaces in which their customers could park. All three conditions imposed were directed to this aim, and all were on their face reasonable. (The only comment that one might make, is that, although the signs made clear that it was a “customer only car park”, the parking charge of £85 did not apply to this limitation, which might be important in central Chelmsford. The explanation is, no doubt, that, unlike a barrier operated scheme where exit can be made conditional on showing or using a ticket or bill obtained from a local shop, a camera operated scheme allows no such control.) The scheme gave BAPF through ParkingEye’s weekly payments some income to cover the costs of providing and maintaining the car park. Judging by ParkingEye’s accounts, and unless the Chelmsford car park was out of the ordinary, the scheme also covered ParkingEye’s costs of operation and gave their shareholders a healthy annual profit. E
G

194 Mr de Waal for Mr Beavis and Mr Butcher for the Consumers’ Association submit that this is to look at matters too broadly and that the focus should be on the individual contract. They also submit that it is imbalanced and unfair in its operation as regards Mr Beavis or any other individual user of the car park. Mr de Waal goes so far as to suggest that the scheme contains a “concealed pitfall”, since it actually operates not by H

A reference to length of time spent parking, but by length of time spent between entry into and exit from the car park. That to my mind is an a-contextual understanding of the signs. Whether or not ParkingEye's cameras at the entry and exit are clearly visible, I do not believe that customers think that individual car parking spaces are monitored or a period spent driving around such a car park looking for a space is likely to fall outside the "2 hour max stay" or period of "Parking limited to 2 hours" specified in the signs.

B 195 More significantly, Mr de Waal and Mr Butcher observe that the scheme only works by taking advantage of human fallibility or unforeseen circumstances. Deliberate overstayers can leave their cars for days and only pay £85 (or the reduced sum if they pay promptly on demand). That is evidently not a problem or the scheme would provide for some form of graduated payment. Other shoppers believe that they will complete their shopping expedition within two hours and intend to do so. The scheme therefore relies on human (over)optimism, that the relevant shopping expedition will be over within two hours, or that the shopper will not find him or herself detained in a queue at the last minute in the last shop. Those who overstay do not incur the £85 or reduced liability in any real sense by agreement, but by misfortune.

C 196 Mr de Waal and Mr Butcher point out that the sum of £85 or £50 could well represent a large part of a car driver's or owner's weekly income, eg in the case of a pensioner, and that, even adjacently to Chelmsford Station it is likely well to exceed any sum that would be payable for parking for say three hours in a car park charging according to time stayed. They also submit that ParkingEye's level of charging compares unfavourably with that authorised under the Civil Enforcement of Parking Contraventions (England) General Regulations 2007 (SI 2007/3483) and the Civil Enforcement of Parking Contraventions (Guidelines on Levels of Charges) (England) Order 2007 (SI 2007/3487). These authorise a penalty charge of £50, reducible, if paid within 21 days, in the case of a contravention detected by an approved device (such as CCTV) or 14 days in other cases, to £25 for parking in contravention of one of the statutory or regulatory provisions listed in Schedule 7, paragraph 4 of the Traffic Management Act 2004. But a scheme relating to the enforcement of parking and parking charges by public authorities in public places is in no way analogous to that in issue on this appeal. Further, merely because statute sets a lower level does not mean that a higher level would not have been reasonable.

D 197 In judging whether ParkingEye's parking charges fall foul of the penalty doctrine, the scheme it operates has to be seen as a whole, bearing in mind all the interests obviously involved. This follows from what I have said in earlier parts of this judgment in relation to the penalty doctrine generally and in relation to its application to clause 5.1 of the agreement in the Cavendish appeal in particular. A useful starting point is that BAPF might have decided to operate such a scheme itself. In that case, its interest in providing for its retail lessees' requirements for parking for their customers would be both clear and clearly relevant. It does not cease to be relevant, because BAPF chose to contract out the operation of the scheme to ParkingEye. The signs disclose that ParkingEye has been engaged as car park manager to provide a traffic space maximisation scheme. The provision of free parking for up to two hours is an obvious benefit and attraction for customers and so also for retail lessees and for BAPF, which has a clear interest in the retail park's success. A

198 The £85 charge for overstaying is certainly set at a level which no ordinary customer (as opposed to someone deliberately overstaying for days) would wish to incur. It has to have, and is intended to have, a deterrent element, as Judge Moloney QC recognised in his careful judgment: para 7.14. Otherwise, a significant number of customers could all too easily decide to overstay, limiting the shopping possibilities of other customers. Turnover of customers is obviously important for a retail park. A scheme which imposed a much smaller charge for short overstaying or operated with fine gradations according to the period of overstay would be likely to be unenforceable and ineffective. It would also not be worth taking customers to court for a few pounds. But the scheme is transparent, and the risk which the customer accepts is clear. The fact that, human nature being what it is, some customers under-estimate or overlook the time required or taken for shopping, a break or whatever else they may do, does not make the scheme excessive or unconscionable. The charge has to be and is set at a level which enables the managers to recover the costs of operating the scheme. It is here also set at a level enabling ParkingEye to make a profit. Unless BAPF was itself prepared to pay ParkingEye, which would have meant, in effect, that it was subsidising customers to park on its own site, this was inevitable. If BAPF had attempted itself to operate such a scheme, one may speculate that the charge might even have had to be set at a higher level to cover its costs without profit, since ParkingEye is evidently a specialist in the area. B

199 In these circumstances, the fact that no individual episode of overstaying, or of mis-parking, could be said to involve ParkingEye or BAPF in any ascertainable damage is irrelevant. What matters is that a charge of the order of £85 (reducible on prompt payment) is an understandable ingredient of a scheme serving legitimate interests. Customers using the car park agree to the scheme by doing so. The position was well summed up by Judge Moloney QC, at para 7.16, when he said that: E

“although there is a sense in which this contractual parking charge has the characteristics of a deterrent penalty, it is neither improper in its purpose nor manifestly excessive in its amount. It is commercially justifiable, not only from the viewpoints of the landowner and ParkingEye, but also from that of the great majority of motorists who enjoy the benefit of free parking at the site, effectively paid for by the minority of defaulters, who have been given clear notice of the consequences of overstaying.” F

ParkingEye Ltd v Beavis—Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999

200 The 1999 Regulations address the problem of unfair terms in contracts concluded between a seller or supplier and a consumer. They implement Directive 93/13/EEC. By virtue of regulation 3(1) (interpretation), ParkingEye is a supplier and Mr Beavis a consumer. Regulation 8(1) provides that: “An unfair term in a contract concluded with a consumer by a seller or supplier shall not be binding on the consumer.” H

A 201 Regulation 5(1) specifies what is to be understood by an unfair term. It provides that:

“A contractual term which has not been individually negotiated shall be regarded as unfair if, contrary to the requirement of good faith, it causes a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations arising under the contract, to the detriment of the consumer.”

B This repeats, exactly, the terms of article 3(1) of the Directive. The terms of the parking contract made between ParkingEye and Mr Beavis were not of course individually negotiated.

202 Regulation 6 provides:

C “(1) Without prejudice to regulation 12, the unfairness of a contractual term shall be assessed, taking into account the nature of the goods or services for which the contract was concluded and by referring, at the time of conclusion of the contract, to all the circumstances attending the conclusion of the contract and to all the other terms of the contract or of another contract on which it is dependent.

D “(2) In so far as it is in plain intelligible language, the assessment of fairness of a term shall not relate— (a) to the definition of the main subject matter of the contract, or (b) to the adequacy of the price or remuneration, as against the goods or services supplied in exchange.”

This, although subsection (2) is differently worded, gives effect to article 4 of the Directive. It is not suggested in the present case that the term requiring payment of £85 (reducible) in the event of non-compliance with ParkingEye’s regulations falls within either limb of regulation 6(2).

E 203 Directive 93/13/EEC indicates in its 16th recital of the Preamble that:

F “the assessment, according to the general criteria chosen, of the unfair character of terms . . . must be supplemented by a means of making an overall evaluation of the different interests involved; whereas this constitutes the requirement of good faith; whereas, in making an assessment of good faith, particular regard shall be had to the strength of the bargaining positions of the parties, whether the consumer had an inducement to agree to the term and whether the goods or services were sold or supplied to the special order of the consumer; whereas the requirement of good faith may be satisfied by the seller or supplier where he deals fairly and equitably with the other party whose legitimate interests he has to take into account.”

G 204 The Court of Justice has in Aziz v Caixa d’Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770, para 76, given guidance as to article 3(1) of the Directive, holding that:

H “Article 3(1) of Directive 93/13 must be interpreted as meaning that: — the concept of ‘significant imbalance’ to the detriment of the consumer must be assessed in the light of an analysis of the rules of national law applicable in the absence of any agreement between the parties, in order to determine whether, and if so to what extent, the contract places the consumer in a less favourable legal situation than that provided for by the national law in force. To that end, an assessment of the legal situation of that consumer having regard to the means at his disposal, under national law, to prevent continued use of unfair terms, should also be carried out;

- in order to assess whether the imbalance arises ‘contrary to the requirement of good faith’, it must be determined whether the seller or supplier, dealing fairly and equitably with the consumer, could reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed to the term concerned in individual contract negotiations.”

205 Domestically, the position was considered by the House of Lords in Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2002] 1 AC 481 where Lord Bingham said, at para 17, that:

“The requirement of significant imbalance is met if a term is so weighted in favour of the supplier as to tilt the parties’ rights and obligations under the contract significantly in his favour. This may be by the granting to the supplier of a beneficial option or discretion or power, or by the imposing on the consumer of a disadvantageous burden or risk or duty. The illustrative terms set out in Schedule 3 to the Regulations provide very good examples of terms which may be regarded as unfair; whether a given term is or is not to be so regarded depends on whether it causes a significant imbalance in the parties’ rights and obligations under the contract. This involves looking at the contract as a whole. But the imbalance must be to the detriment of the consumer . . . The requirement of good faith in this context is one of fair and open dealing. Openness requires that the terms should be expressed fully, clearly and legibly, containing no concealed pitfalls or traps. Appropriate prominence should be given to terms which might operate disadvantageously to the customer. Fair dealing requires that a supplier should not, whether deliberately or unconsciously, take advantage of the consumer’s necessity, indigence, lack of experience, unfamiliarity with the subject matter of the contract, weak bargaining position or any other factor listed in or analogous to those listed in Schedule 2 to the Regulations. Good faith in this context is not an artificial or technical concept; nor, since Lord Mansfield was its champion, is it a concept wholly unfamiliar to British lawyers. It looks to good standards of commercial morality and practice. Regulation 4(1) lays down a composite test, covering both the making and the substance of the contract, and must be applied bearing clearly in mind the objective which the Regulations are designed to promote.”

206 In the same case, Lord Millett said of regulation 5(1), at para 54:

“There can be no one single test of this. It is obviously useful to assess the impact of an impugned term on the parties’ rights and obligations by comparing the effect of the contract with the term and the effect it would have without it. But the inquiry cannot stop there. It may also be necessary to consider the effect of the inclusion of the term on the substance or core of the transaction; whether if it were drawn to his attention the consumer would be likely to be surprised by it; whether the term is a standard term, not merely in similar non-negotiable consumer contracts, but in commercial contracts freely negotiated between parties acting on level terms and at arms’ length; and whether, in such cases, the party adversely affected by the inclusion of the term or his lawyer might

A reasonably be expected to object to its inclusion and press for its deletion. The list is not necessarily exhaustive; other approaches may sometimes be more appropriate.”

B 207 Many of the submissions under the 1999 Regulations overlap as a matter of fact with submissions already considered in the context of the penalty doctrine. The legal test is of course different. It is however relevant and necessary in the present context as in relation to the penalty doctrine to consider “the different interests involved” (16th recital to the Directive), which brings in all the factors discussed in paras 193–199 above. Again, reliance is placed on the fact that the charge of £85 (reducible) is incurred by overstaying for the shortest of periods, and does not vary according to the length of overstay. But that, for reasons already indicated, is an integral element of the scheme.

C 208 Reliance is also placed on the Court of Justice’s emphasis in the Aziz case [2013] All ER (EC) 770 on the need to consider, first, what the position would have been under national law apart from the challenged term and, second, on whether the supplier could reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed such a term in individual contract negotiations. Bearing in mind the need under the Directive and Regulations to consider all the circumstances, the Court of Justice cannot be taken to have been identifying considerations that would by themselves be conclusive, rather than relevant. That also reflects what Lord Millett said in the passage just quoted. It is clear that, but for the agreement made when parking, Mr Beavis would not have had any right to park at all, and would have been liable to damages in trespass, for which it would, almost certainly, not have been worth BAPF’s while to pursue him. That would not have achieved any of BAPF’s aims, and cannot here be an appropriate comparator when assessing the legitimacy or fairness of the scheme put in place by BAPF and ParkingEye. In reality, BAPF would have had to make some entirely different arrangement, involving perhaps barriers with either machines to take payments or a car park attendant to cater for overstayers. But that would not mean that BAPF or ParkingEye could or would have lowered the charge for overstaying, which, as stated, had to be set at a deterrent level if their aim of encouraging a regular turnover of customers was to be achieved.

E 209 The submission that ParkingEye could not reasonably assume that customers in Mr Beavis’s position would have agreed to the scheme in individual contract negotiations is less easy to address. A customer in Mr Beavis’s position, if asked about the terms on which he would wish to park, would no doubt have been very satisfied with a proposal of two hours free parking, but would very probably have asked for some form of graduated payment in the event of overstaying. Confronted with the other interests involved and the considerations making that unacceptable from BAPF’s and ParkingEye’s viewpoint, I am not at all confident that he or she would have refused to accept the risk of having to pay £85 (reducible on prompt payment) in the event of overstaying.

H 210 Mr de Waal and Mr Butcher submit that this would only have been because the customer would have underestimated the risk, and, at this point, again suggest that the scheme trades off the weakness of well meaning customers. They point to Office of Fair Trading v Ashbourne Management Services Ltd [2012] LLR 182, where Kitchin J held that the minimum membership term provisions in a number of standard form gym membership contracts were unfair and invalid, because A

“The defendants’ business model was designed and calculated to take advantage of the naivety and inexperience of the average consumer using gym and health clubs at the lower end of the market. The defendants knew that the average consumer overestimates the use he will make of the gym and health clubs and exploited this fact.” B

The problem in this respect was that the defendants, who operated gym membership schemes, themselves accepted that it was “a notorious fact that many people join such gym clubs having resolved to exercise regularly but fail to attend at all after two or three months”: para 164.

211 A reading of Kitchin J’s judgment indicates how fact-sensitive his conclusions were, differing according to his analysis of the particular terms of different contracts before him. In particular, because contracts 11 to 13 before him allowed early termination in a wider range of circumstances (eg medical, change of employment or a move of more than 15 miles: para 50), he was prepared to accept a minimum term not exceeding 12 months—this, even though the identified problem related to members joining enthusiastically without thinking that they might well be leaving after only two or three months; and he added that he might well have been prepared to accept up to 24 or 36 months, had the contracts given an option to terminate after 12 months, coupled with a requirement to reimburse the differential between the agreed subscription and a shorter term subscription in respect of the period up to termination: para 174. There was therefore a balancing of all the interests involved at each stage. C

212 Although the submissions that the scheme was unfair within the meaning of the 1999 Regulations were forcefully presented, I cannot ultimately accept them. Judge Moloney QC summarised his conclusions as follows, at para 7.18: D

“(a) It is difficult to categorise as not in good faith a simple and familiar provision of this sort of which very clear notice was given to the consumer in advance. (b) There is not a significant imbalance between the parties’ rights and obligations, when the motorist is given a valuable privilege (two hours free parking) in return for a promise to pay a specified sum in the event of overstaying, provided that sum is not disproportionately high. (c) The charge in question is not disproportionately high, and in so far as it exceeds compensation its amount is justifiable, and not in bad faith or detrimental to the consumer.” E

213 I agree with the way Judge Moloney QC put it, as did the Court of Appeal. In the result, I would dismiss Mr Beavis’s appeal. F

Conclusion

214 It follows that in the Cavendish case, I would allow Cavendish’s appeal in relation to both clause 5.1 and clause 5.6; and that I would also dismiss Mr Beavis’s appeal in the second case brought by ParkingEye. G

LORD HODGE JSC

215 I adopt with gratitude the summary of the facts and the procedural history of the two appeals in the joint judgment of Lord Neuberger of H

A Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC (at paras 44–68 in relation to the Cavendish appeal and paras 89–96 in relation to Mr Beavis’s appeal). Like them, I would allow the Cavendish appeal and dismiss the appeal by Mr Beavis.

B 216 Cavendish’s primary submission was that this court should abolish the rule that the courts do not enforce penalty clauses. This issue affects Scots law as well as English law as the rule is essentially the same in each jurisdiction, although the Scottish courts have in certain circumstances a power to abate the penalty which the English courts do not. Scots law has used English authorities in its development—see Bell’s Principles of the Law of Scotland, 10th ed (1899), section 34—and has, through Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo Y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, (1904) 7 F (HL) 77, had a significant influence on the development of English law. I therefore focus on authorities from both jurisdictions in this judgment but also refer to authorities from other common law jurisdictions.

C 217 The Cavendish appeal raises three principal issues: (i) What is the scope of the rule against penalties? (ii) Whether that rule should be abrogated or at least altered so as not to apply in commercial transactions where the contracting parties are of equal bargaining power and each acts on skilled legal advice? And if not, (iii) whether and, if so, how the rule should be applied in the circumstances of the appeal?

D 218 I have come to the conclusion that the rule, which in each jurisdiction is now a rule of the law of contract, should not be abrogated. I have also concluded that its application in the circumstances of the Cavendish contract does not require the court to refuse to give effect to the parties’ agreement. I set out my reasoning below before turning more briefly to Mr Beavis’s appeal.

The scope of the rule against penalties

E 219 The modern law in relation to penalty clauses was laid down by the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a quartet of cases over 100 years ago. First, the House of Lords examined a liquidated damages clause in the Clydebank Engineering case in 1904. Then the Privy Council applied the decision in Clydebank to a retention clause in Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368 and to a liquidated damages clause in Webster v Bosanquet [1912] AC 394. Finally, in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, which again concerned a liquidated damages clause, the House of Lords, in the speech of Lord Dunedin, set out an approach to the rule which has dominated judicial discussion ever since.

220 In that case at pp 86–88 Lord Dunedin drew various propositions of law from the earlier three cases of the quartet. To assist later discussion I set out those propositions so far as necessary:

H “1. Though the parties to a contract who use the words ‘penalty’ or ‘liquidated damages’ may prima facie be supposed to mean what they say, yet the expression used is not conclusive. The court must find out whether the payment stipulated is in truth a penalty or liquidated damages. This doctrine may be said to be found passim in nearly every case.

“2. The essence of a penalty is a payment of money stipulated as in terrorem of the offending party; the essence of liquidated damages is a genuine covenanted pre-estimate of damage (Clydebank Engineering
. . .). A

“3. The question whether a sum stipulated is penalty or liquidated damages is a question of construction to be decided upon the terms and inherent circumstances of each particular contract, judged of as at the time of the making of the contract, not as at the time of the breach (Public Works Comr v Hills and Webster v Bosanquet). B

“4. To assist this task of construction various tests have been suggested, which if applicable to the case under consideration may prove helpful, or even conclusive. Such are: (a) It will be held to be penalty if the sum stipulated for is extravagant and unconscionable in amount in comparison with the greatest loss that could conceivably be proved to have followed from the breach: Illustration given by the Earl of Halsbury LC in Clydebank case.) (b) It will be held to be a penalty if the breach consists only in not paying a sum of money, and the sum stipulated is a sum greater than the sum which ought to have been paid (Kemble v Farren (1829) 6 Bing 141). This though one of the most ancient instances is truly a corollary to the last test . . . (c) There is a presumption (but no more) that it is a penalty when ‘a single lump sum is made payable by way of compensation, on the occurrence of one or more or all of several events, some of which may occasion serious and others but trifling damage’ (Lord Watson in Elphinstone v Monkland Iron and Coal Co (1886) 11 App Cas 332). C

“On the other hand: (d) It is no obstacle to the sum stipulated being a genuine pre-estimate of damage, that the consequences of the breach are such as to make precise pre-estimation almost an impossibility. On the contrary, that is just the situation when it is probable that pre-estimated damage was the true bargain between the parties (Clydebank case, the Earl of Halsbury LC at p 11; Webster v Bosanquet, Lord Mersey at p 398).” D

221 I observe that Lord Dunedin stated the first three propositions without qualification. The first and the third have caused no difficulty: the court looks to the substance of the transaction and approaches the matter as a question of construing the particular contract at the time when it was made. The second has caused difficulty when it has been treated as creating in all cases a dichotomy between a genuine pre-estimate of damage on the one hand and a deterrent against breach on the other, if the former is understood to be a calculation of what common law damages would be.
Indeed, in the Dunlop case itself the clause was upheld not because an individual discounted sale would cause loss of the stipulated magnitude but because of the danger of repeated undercutting of the appellant’s prices for their products, which would disrupt their trading system—see in particular Lord Atkinson at pp 92–93. I will return to that proposition. Lord Dunedin prefaced the tests in the fourth proposition with a recognition that they might be neither helpful nor conclusive in a particular case. That is important, but, as I shall seek to explain, I take issue with that approach in relation to proposition 4(a), which in my view contains the essence of the test, where the contractual provisions seek to fix a sum payable as damages, F
G
H

- A and an adapted form of that test applies where the clause is protecting other interests of the innocent party.

(a) The clauses to which the rule against penalties applies

- B 222 One of the reasons for the problem with the second proposition has been that the penalty doctrine applies not only to clauses which seek to set out other consequences of a breach of contract. Thus in Lordsvale Finance plc v Bank of Zambia [1996] QB 752 Colman J, in a celebrated judgment dealing with a contractual provision to increase the rate of interest on a loan during a period of default, did not ask himself whether the provision was a genuine pre-estimate of damage. He considered whether it was commercially justifiable to increase the consideration payable under an executory contract on the happening of default. He concluded that the 1% prospective increase in the interest rate was commercially justifiable so long as the dominant purpose was not to deter the borrower from breach. In my view, that decision was clearly correct as a default affected the credit risk that the lender undertook.

- D 223 The Court of Appeal in Cine Bes Filmcilik ve Yapimcilik AS v United International Pictures [2004] 1 CLC 401 supported Colman J's approach. Mance LJ, who produced the leading judgment, recognised (at para 15) that there were clauses which might operate on breach and which were commercially justifiable but which did not fall into either category of a dichotomy between a genuine pre-estimate of damages and a penalty. In that case UIP had granted a licence to Cine Bes to show films on its movie channel. There were disputes over the licence agreement which resulted in litigation which the parties compromised in an agreement to grant a fresh licence. UIP later terminated the fresh licence on the ground of Cine Bes's breach of contract. One of the provisions that Cine Bes challenged as a penalty was that it should pay to UIP not only its enforcement costs for the default on the fresh licence but also its litigation costs in the prior litigation. The Court of Appeal rejected this challenge, Mance LJ stating, at para 33:

- F "The agreement regarding past litigation costs was understandable in the overall context of the settlement of the prior litigation. It would be wrong to treat it as if it were there to deter [Cine Bes] from, or to penalise or punish [Cine Bes] for, any default. It was an understandable and reasonable commercial condition upon which UIP was prepared to dispose of the prior litigation, and to enter into the fresh licence."

- G Mance LJ, drawing on Colman J's analysis, drew a distinction between a reasonable commercial condition on the one hand and a punishment on the other. As I shall seek to show, there is support for this dichotomy in the older case law.

- H 224 The Court of Appeal again considered the penalty doctrine in Murray v Leisureplay plc [2005] IRLR 946, which concerned a provision in the employment contract of a chief executive that entitled him to one year's gross salary in the event of the termination of his employment without one year's notice. The company challenged this entitlement as a penalty because common law damages would have given the director a sum after deduction of tax and national insurance contributions and he would have been under an obligation to mitigate his loss. The court rejected this challenge, accepting that the provision, which provided the director with generous reassurance against dismissal and could result in greater recovery than the amount of his actual loss which he could recover at common law, was commercially justified. A

225 In my view, this broader approach of Colman J and the Court of Appeal involves a correct analysis of the law and escapes the straightjacket into which the law risked being placed by an over-rigorous emphasis on a dichotomy between a genuine pre-estimate of damages on the one hand and a penalty on the other. To justify that view I will have to look briefly at the law before the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79. Before doing so, it is necessary to look at other provisions relating to breach of contract to which the rule against penalties has been applied or may apply and in particular (i) clauses withholding payments which were otherwise due, (ii) clauses requiring the party in breach to transfer property to the innocent party and (iii) clauses providing for the payment of a non-refundable deposit in a contract of sale. B C

226 Clauses withholding payments on breach: I see no principled reason why the law on penalties should be confined to clauses that require the contract-breaker to pay money in the event of breach and not extend to clauses that in the same circumstance allow the innocent party to withhold moneys which are otherwise due. Indeed, there is ample authority to support the view that clauses which allow the innocent party to withhold payments on breach may be unenforceable as penalties where the sums retained are, or may be, wholly disproportionate to the loss suffered by the withholding party. One of the quartet of cases to which I referred in para 219 above—Comr of Public Works v Hills [1906] AC 368—is an example of the application of the rule against penalties to a clause seeking in the event of a breach of contract to withhold money otherwise due to a contractor. In English law the House of Lords in Modern Engineering (Bristol) Ltd v Gilbert-Ash (Northern) Ltd [1974] AC 689 considered a clause in a construction sub-contract that allowed the main contractor to suspend or withhold payment of any moneys due to the sub-contractor if the sub-contractor failed to comply with any of its conditions. While the contractor conceded that this part of the contractual clause was a penalty, it is clear from the speeches of their Lordships that they agreed with the concession: see Lord Reid at p 698D–F, Lord Morris of Borth-y-Gest at p 703G, Viscount Dilhorne at p 711D and Lord Salmon at p 723H. The majority of the Court of Appeal (Stuart-Smith and O’Connor LJJ) followed that approach in The Padre Island (No 2) [1989] 1 Lloyd’s Rep 239. D E F

227 Cavendish has argued that such clauses should be seen as forfeiture clauses to which the law of penalties should not apply. Ms Smith urged that it would be a recipe for confusion if a single clause were to be classified in two different ways. I disagree. There is no reason in principle why a contractual provision, which involves forfeiture of sums otherwise due, should not be subjected to the rule against penalties, if the forfeiture is wholly disproportionate either to the loss suffered by the innocent party or to another justifiable commercial interest which that party has sought to protect by the clause. If the forfeiture is not so exorbitant and therefore is enforceable under the rule against penalties, the court can then consider whether under English law it should grant equitable relief from forfeiture, looking at the position of the parties after the breach and the circumstances in which the contract was broken. This was the approach which Dillon LJ G H

A adopted in BICC plc v Burndy Corpn [1985] Ch 232 and in which Ackner LJ concurred. The court risks no confusion if it asks first whether, as a matter of construction, the clause is a penalty and, if it answers that question in the negative, considers whether relief in equity should be granted having regard to the position of the parties after the breach.

B 228 I therefore conclude that clauses that authorise the withholding of sums otherwise due to the contract-breaker may fall within the scope of the rule against penalties.

C 229 Different considerations may arise when, on its rescission of a contract of sale, the vendor seeks to retain instalments of the price which the purchaser has made; in English law the equitable remedy against forfeiture may be available to preserve the purchaser's claim for restitution of the instalments: Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 QB 476; Else (1982) Ltd v Parkland Holdings Ltd [1994] 1 BCLC 130. But we are not concerned with such circumstances in this appeal.

D 230 Clauses requiring the transfer of property on breach: Again I see no reason in principle why the rule against penalties should not extend to clauses that require the contract-breaker to transfer property to the innocent party on breach. There is authority in both English law and Scots law supporting this approach. In Jobson v Johnson [1989] 1 WLR 1026 the Court of Appeal considered a clause that required a purchaser of shares to re-transfer shares to the vendor for a fixed consideration if he defaulted on payment of instalments of the price. The clause was treated as a penalty because it fixed the re-transfer price at a modest figure regardless of the number of the much larger instalments which the purchaser had paid before his default. The case was an unusual one and the approach of the court to a remedy was influenced by the absence of a counterclaim for relief from forfeiture. I do not accept the conclusion in that case that the court had power in English law to modify a penalty: see para 283 below. But that does not, in my view, call into question the court's unanimous conclusion that the clause was caught by the rule against penalties. See also the Else (1982) Ltd case [1994] 1 BCLC 130, Evans LJ at pp 137H and 138E. As I have said in para 227 above I see no confusion resulting from an assessment first, whether a clause is a penalty and, if it is not, considering whether to grant relief from forfeiture.

G 231 In the Scottish case Watson v Noble (1885) 13 R 347 a shipowner sold seven shares in a trawler to the appellant and was paid £100 for them. In a subsequent agreement the owner agreed to employ the appellant as captain of the vessel and to hold the shares in trust for him. The shipowner imposed an obligation on the captain to remain sober and attentive to his duties on pain of dismissal and forfeiture of both his shares and the right to claim repayment of the £100 which he had paid for the shares. In an application by the appellant for repayment of the £100 after his dismissal, the Second Division treated the forfeiture of the shares as a penalty which could not be enforced and, because the shipowner refused to transfer the shares, required him to repay the £100 which he had received for them.

H 232 There is also considerable support in Australian authority for the application of the rule against penalties to clauses requiring a party in breach to transfer property to the innocent party. See, for example, Bysouth v Shire of Blackburn and Mitcham (No 2) [1928] VLR 562, 574–575 (Irvine CJ); Forestry Commission of New South Wales v Stefanetto (1976) 133 CLR 507, 521 (Mason J); Wollondilly Shire Council v Picton Power Lines Pty Ltd (1994) 33 NSWLR 551, 555F–G (Handley JA); Ringrow Pty Ltd v BP Australia Pty Ltd (2005) 224 CLR 656, 665 in which the point was conceded and Interstar Wholesale Finance Pty Ltd v Integral Home Loans Pty Ltd [2008] NSWCA 310, paras 101–102 (Allsop P). The Court of Appeal in New Zealand has taken a similar view: Amaltal Corpn Ltd v Maruha (NZ) Corpn Ltd [2004] 2 NZLR 614, para 61 (Blanchard J).

233 I am satisfied therefore that the rule against penalties can be applied to a contractual term that provides for the transfer on breach of contract of property from the contract-breaker to the innocent party.

234 Clauses requiring the purchaser to pay an extravagant non-refundable deposit: In English law a non-refundable deposit is a guarantee by a purchaser that the contract will be performed: Howe v Smith (1884) 27 ChD 89, 95 (Cotton LJ) and Soper v Arnold (1889) 14 App Cas 429, 435 per Lord Macnaghten. It provides the vendor with some assurance of performance while the property is taken off the market during the period from the date of the contract to the completion of performance. If the contract is performed, the deposit forms part of the purchase price. If the purchaser breaks the contract, the vendor keeps the deposit. As Fry LJ stated in Howe v Smith, at p 101:

“It is not merely a part payment, but is then also an earnest to bind the bargain so entered into, and creates by the fear of its forfeiture a motive in the payer to perform the rest of the contract.”

Where the deposit was fixed at a reasonable figure, its forfeiture on breach of contract does not bring into play the rule against penalties, its purpose not being related to any loss that the vendor may have suffered and that he may seek to recover in damages: Wallis v Smith (1882) 21 ChD 243, 258, Jessel MR. But in Stockloser v Johnson [1954] 1 QB 476, 491 Denning LJ suggested that a party could not call a stipulation for an initial payment of 50% of the purchase price a deposit and thereby achieve a forfeiture from which equity could give no relief. He said, at p 492, that the equity of restitution was to be tested not at the time of the contract but by the conditions existing when it was invoked. This suggests that he was considering relief from forfeiture rather than the rule against penalties. More directly relevant is Lord Radcliffe’s statement in Campbell Discount Co Ltd v Bridge [1962] AC 600, 624, when discussing deposits:

“I do not see any sufficient reason why in the right setting a sum of money may not be treated as a penalty, even though it arises from an obligation that is essentially a guarantee.”

235 The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has developed the idea that an extravagant deposit should not be forfeited on breach of contract. In Linggi Plantations Ltd v Jagatheesan [1972] 1 MLJ 89, 94 Lord Hailsham LC suggested that where, on investigation, the real nature of an initial payment, which was termed a deposit, was shown to be the imposition of a penalty, it might be recovered by the purchaser, and that it was only a reasonable deposit that was irrecoverable. More recently, in Workers Trust & Merchant Bank Ltd v Dojap Investments Ltd [1993] AC 573, the Board addressed the question whether a deposit of 25% of the purchase price in the contract for the purchase of land from a bank at auction in Jamaica (where

A 10% deposits were customary) could be forfeited. Lord Browne-Wilkinson, who gave the Board's advice, spoke, at p 579, of the risk that the special treatment which the law gives to deposits being abused if the contracting parties attach the label "deposit" to a penalty. The Privy Council made the validity of a deposit conditional on whether it was "reasonable as earnest money". Lord Browne-Wilkinson stated, at p 580:

B "In order to be reasonable a true deposit must be objectively operating as 'earnest money' and not as a penalty. To allow the test of reasonableness to depend upon the practice of one class of vendor, which exercises considerable financial muscle, would be to allow them to evade the law against penalties by adopting practices of their own."

C The Board therefore took as a norm the long established practice both in Jamaica and the United Kingdom of a deposit of 10% and required a vendor who sought a larger percentage to show special circumstances to justify that deposit. In effect, the Board applied a test of commercial justification akin to the test which Colman J later applied in the Lordsvale Finance plc case [1996] QB 752.

D 236 In Polyset Ltd v Panhandat Ltd (2002) 5 HKCFAR 234 the Hong Kong Court of Final Appeal carried out a thorough review of the law relating to deposits. The court considered the cases which I have mentioned and concluded that the court would intervene to prevent forfeiture where parties abused the concept of deposit. The forfeiture of a deposit would be enforced only if it were "reasonable as earnest money". Where the deposit exceeded the conventional amount, the court would permit forfeiture only if the party seeking to forfeit could show that exceptional circumstances justified the higher amount: Ribeiro PJ at para 90, Bokhary PJ at paras 10–18, Chan PJ at paras 40–42; Lord Millett NPJ at para 165. Because Bokhary PJ and Ribeiro PJ considered that the test of "genuine pre-estimate of loss" applied in the rule against penalties when considering whether a sum was liquidated damages, they did not view the "reasonable as earnest money" test as part of the law of penalties. But if, as I think correct, the true test for penalties is wider than the "genuine pre-estimate of loss" test (see paras 242–255 below), the Hong Kong court's conclusions were wholly consistent with Lord Browne-Wilkinson's approach in the Workers Trust case [1993] AC 573.

G 237 Historically, Scots law has followed English law in treating deposits as outside the rule against penalties, citing English authorities in support of the view that a deposit was a guarantee of or security for performance: Commercial Bank of Scotland Ltd v Beal (1890) 18 R 80; Roberts & Cooper v Salvesen & Co 1918 SC 794 and Zemhunt (Holdings) Ltd v Control Securities plc 1992 SC 58. There has been no discussion whether that exclusion is confined to reasonable deposits. But in none of those cases was there a question whether the deposit was extravagant. In the Roberts & Cooper case 1918 SC 794, in which the First Division upheld the forfeiture of a £3,000 deposit on the purchase of a ship for £30,000 when the purchaser repudiated the contract, Lord Skerrington, at p 814, suggested that there was no reason why in a proper case a clause for the forfeiture of a purchaser's deposit should not be construed as a penalty and be unenforceable. I agree. As Scots law has followed English law in relation to the law of deposits, I see no reason why it should not adopt the modern approach of excluding only reasonable deposits from the rule against penalties. A

238 I conclude therefore that in both English law and Scots law (a) a deposit which is not reasonable as earnest money may be challenged as a penalty and (b) where the stipulated deposit exceeds the percentage set by long-established practice the vendor must show special circumstances to justify that deposit if it is not to be treated as an unenforceable penalty.

239 Circumstances other than breach of contract: The rule against penalties applies only in the context of a breach of contract. In English law the House of Lords has so held in Export Credits Guarantee Department v Universal Oil Products Co [1983] 1 WLR 399, 403, per Lord Roskill. In Scots law the question has not reached the House of Lords or the Supreme Court. But in Granor Finance Ltd v Liquidator of Eastore Ltd 1974 SLT 296, 298, Lord Keith, when a Lord Ordinary, held that the rule against penalties had no application in a case which was not a case of breach of contract, and more recently, in EFT Commercial Ltd v Security Change Ltd 1992 SC 414, the First Division has re-asserted that position. B C

240 Mr Bloch, counsel for Mr Makdessi, suggested in the course of debate that the court could extend the rule against penalties. He referred to the controversial decision of the High Court of Australia in Andrews v Australia and New Zealand Banking Group Ltd (2012) 247 CLR 205, in which the court held that bank charges, which were imposed on customers on the occurrence of events which were not breaches of contract, could be characterised as penalties and thus be unenforceable. D

241 As this suggestion is peripheral to the main arguments in this appeal, I deal with it shortly. I am satisfied that the rule against penalties in both English and Scots law has applied only in relation to secondary obligations—penal remedies for breach of contract. In Scotland, the courts administer an equitable as well as a common law jurisdiction without having two branches of jurisdiction. There is no freestanding equitable jurisdiction to render unenforceable as penalties stipulations operative as a result of events which do not entail a breach of contract. Such an innovation would, if desirable, require legislation. E F

(b) The true test for a penalty

242 In para 221 above I suggested (a) that there was a problem in the way in which the courts had read Lord Dunedin's second proposition and (b) that his proposition 4(a) contained the essence of the test: that is, whether the secondary obligation was exorbitant and unconscionable.

243 The rule against penalties is a rule of contract law based on public policy. It is a question of construction of the parties' contract judged by reference to the circumstances at the time of contracting; the public policy is that the courts will not enforce a stipulation for punishment for breach of contract. G

244 In the first of the quartet of cases, Clydebank Engineering [1905] AC 6, the House of Lords held that the courts would not enforce a measure that was extravagant and unconscionable: the Earl of Halsbury LC at p 10, Lord Davey at p 16 and Lord Robertson at p 20. Different expressions were used to describe the manifestly excessive nature of the measure in comparison with the interest which the challenged clause protected. But at its heart was the idea of exorbitance or gross excessiveness. H

A 245 The phrase in Lord Dunedin’s second proposition appears to have come from the opinion of Lord Kyllachy as Lord Ordinary in the Clydebank Engineering case (1903) 5 F 1016, 1022 where he contrasted a measure which was “reasonable and moderate” and one which was “exorbitant and unconscionable” and said of the latter that:

B “the amount stipulated might be such as to make it plain that it was merely stipulated in terrorem, and could not possibly have formed . . . a genuine pre-estimate of the creditor’s probable or possible interest in the due performance of the principal obligation.”

C 246 While Lord Kyllachy’s emphasis on a genuine pre-estimate suggests that he was considering clauses which are intended to fix the level of damages paid on breach of contract, the overriding test of exorbitance fits the wider range of circumstances in which the rule against penalties has been applied, including enhanced interest charges (the Lordsvale Finance case [1996] QB 752), the agreement to pay an employee sums in excess of common law damages (the Murray case [2005] IRLR 946), and deposits: the Workers Trust & Merchant Bank Ltd case [1993] AC 573. Lord Robertson’s focus in the Clydebank Engineering case [1905] AC 6, 20, on the innocent party’s interest in the due performance of the principal obligation and his posing of the question—“had the respondents no interest to protect by that clause, or was that interest palpably incommensurate with the sums agreed on?”—provide the framework for the application of the exorbitance test to those wider circumstances.

D 247 Lord Dunedin’s propositions were his summary of existing authorities. In his second proposition he drew on Lord Kyllachy’s phrase to state the paradigms of a penalty on the one hand and liquidated damages on the other. Exorbitance featured in his proposition 4(a) and also in the speeches of Lord Atkinson ([1915] AC 79, 97: “unreasonable, unconscionable or extravagant”) and Lord Parmoor (p 101: “extravagant or unconscionable”; “extravagant disproportion between the agreed sum and the amount of any damage capable of pre-estimate”). The focus on the disproportion between the specified sum and damage capable of pre-estimation makes sense in the context of a damages clause but is an artificial concept if applied to clauses which have another commercial justification.

E 248 Similarly, I doubt whether it is helpful to rely on the concept of deterrence. Many contractual provisions are coercive in nature, encouraging a contracting party to perform his or her obligations; the prospect of liability in common law damages itself is a spur to performance.

F 249 Similarly, a deposit provides a motive for performance: para 234 above.

G 250 Instead, the broader test of exorbitance or manifest excess compared with the innocent party’s commercial interests fits the various applications of the rule against penalties and is consistent with the repeated warnings by the courts against imposing too stringent a standard. Thus in Robophone Facilities Ltd v Blank [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1447E Diplock LJ warned “The court should not be astute to descry a ‘penalty clause’”. In Philips Hong Kong Ltd v Attorney General of Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41, 59 Lord Woolf said:

H “The court has to be careful not to set too stringent a standard and bear in mind that what the parties have agreed should normally be upheld.

Any other approach will lead to undesirable uncertainty especially in commercial contracts.” A

In the Murray case [2005] IRLR 946, para 43 Arden LJ expressed a similar view when she said, “The parties are allowed a generous margin”.

249 When the court makes a value judgment on whether a provision is exorbitant or unconscionable, it has regard to the legitimate interests, commercial or otherwise, which the innocent party has sought to protect. B
Where the obligation which has been breached is to pay money on a certain date, the innocent party’s interests are normally fully served by the payment of the stipulated sum together with interest and the costs of recovery. More complex questions arise where there is an obligation to perform by a certain date, such as the construction of the torpedo boats in the Clydebank Engineering case [1905] AC 6, as the assessment of the loss suffered by the innocent party may often be difficult and parties may have an interest in fixing the level of compensation in advance to avoid the necessity of an expensive trial. In Scots law a distinction has also been drawn between the breach of an obligation to perform some act and the wilful breach of a prohibition; in the latter circumstance the court is less inclined to treat a harsh contractual remedy as unconscionable. Thus in Forrest & Barr v Henderson, Coulbourn & Co (1869) 8 M 187, 202 Lord Neaves stated: C

“There are great differences in the stipulations themselves that are so made, and, in particular, there is a great difference according as the breach of contract consists in faciendo and in non faciendo. If a man wilfully goes against what he has promised not to do, that is an unfavourable case for restriction.”

Lord Deas expressed a similar view at p 196. E

250 As the rule against penalties is based on public policy and has developed over time, its current form is of more significance than its historical development. Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC have discussed the origins and development of the rule in English law in paras 4–11 of their judgment. Professor David Ibbetson in A Historical Introduction to the Law of Obligations (1999), pp 255–256, records how Scots law and South Africa’s Roman-Dutch law came to influence the modern English rule in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79. It may therefore be helpful to say something about the development of the rule in Scots law. F

251 In early Scots law penalties were associated with usury. While there are examples of the Court of Session enforcing penalties in the early 16th century, in Home v Hepburn (1549) Mor 10033 the Court of Session prohibited the imposition of punishments for breach of contract. In the abbreviated report of that case the court held: G

“de practica regni, paenae conventionales non possunt exigi, nisi quatenus interest actores, quia sapiunt quendam usuram et inhonestum questum . . .”

Balfour’s Practicks (1579) gives a vernacular account of the case in these terms (republished in 1962: Peter G B McNeill (ed), The Practicks of Sir James Balfour of Pittendreich (1962, Stair Society), vol I, p 151): H

“Be the law of this realme, poena conventionales, sic as ane soume of money adjectit, with consent of parties, in ony contract or obligatioun, in

A name of pane, may not be askit be ony persoun bot in sa far as he is interestit, hurt or skaithit; because all sic painis are in ane maner usuraris, and dishonest, made for lucre or gane.”

It is of note that the judgment referred to the innocent party’s interest in performance (“interesse”—to have an interest) as well his injury or damage (“skaith”), foreshadowing Lord Robertson’s formulation in the Clydebank

B Engineering case [1905] AC 6. Viscount Stair in his Institutions of the Law of Scotland regarded the power to modify exorbitant bonds and contracts as part of the nobile officium of the Court of Session, recognising that “necessitous debtors” yield to “exorbitant penalties”: Stair, IV.3.2. A penalty clause was seen as a secondary obligation, an additional means of enforcement; tendering the penalty did not release the contract-breaker from his primary obligation: University of Glasgow v Faculty of Physicians and Surgeons (1840) 1 Robin App 397, 415.

C 252 The Court of Session, “as the supreme court of law and equity,” exercised an equitable power of mitigation: Bell, Commentaries on the Law of Scotland, 7th ed (1870), vol I, p 700. Many of the cases concerned the imposition of additional rent on an agricultural tenant who departed from the agreed cropping cycle of the land (as in Stratton v Graham (1789) 3 Pat App 119). In relation to penalty clauses in bonds, the courts enforced the penalty only to the extent of recovering the principal sum due, interest and expenses. The power to modify a penalty was placed on a statutory basis and the extant provision is section 5 of the Debts Securities (Scotland) Act 1856 (19 & 20 Vict c 91):

D “and in all cases where penalties for non-payment, over and above
E performance, are contained in bonds or other obligations for sums of money, and are made the subject of adjudication, or of demand in any other shape, it shall be in the power of the court to modify and restrict such penalties, so as not to exceed the real and necessary expenses incurred in making the debt effectual.”

More recently, in Wirral Borough Council v Curry’s Group plc 1998 SLT
F 463, 467 Lord Hamilton confirmed that the statutory power to modify extends to money obligations other than bonds. Although the Scottish Parliament has enacted legislation to abolish the remedy of adjudication as a means of debt recovery (the Bankruptcy and Diligence etc (Scotland) Act 2007), the court retains a power to modify such penalties for failure to fulfil monetary obligations.

G 253 By the mid-19th century, case law on penalty clauses had moved to contracts for the supply of goods and services and construction contracts. Three cases, in which Lord Inglis participated, provided the backdrop for the Clydebank Engineering decision, the first of the quartet of cases which set out the modern law. In Johnston v Robertson (1861) 23 D 646, the Second Division held that a charge of £5 per week for the late completion of a poor house was liquidated damages and not a penalty; Lord Justice Clerk Inglis, H at p 655, posed the question whether the stipulation was a reasonable and appropriate mode of enforcing the obligation to complete the work by the specified date and whether the sum was proportionate to the loss suffered by the innocent party. In Craig v M’Beath (1863) 1 M 1020, 1022, Lord Justice Clerk Inglis cited Home v Hepburn (1549) Mor 10033 in support of the proposition that “Parties cannot lawfully enter into an agreement that the one party shall be punished at the suit of the other.” Lord Young enunciated a similar principle in Robertson v Driver’s Trustees (1881) 8 R 555, 562, stating that the law will not let people punish each other. In the Forrest & Barr case 8 M 187, which concerned the purchase and erection of a crane in a shipyard by a specified date and a penalty of £20 per day for delay, Lord President Inglis stated, at p 193, that equity would interfere to prevent a claim being maintained to an exorbitant and unconscionable amount. Lord Deas, Lord Ardmillan and Lord Neaves used the same expressions, at pp 198, 199 and p 203 respectively; Lord Kinloch, at p 201, spoke of a claim being “so utterly extravagant and unreasonable” that the court could infer that it was a penalty or punishment.

254 This approach to penalty clauses is consistent with the judgments of the House of Lords in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79 in which an extravagant disproportion between an agreed sum and the innocent party’s interest in the due performance of the contract would amount to what Lord Parmoor described, at p 100, as “a penal sum inserted as a punishment on the defaulter irrespective of the amount of any loss which could at the time have been in contemplation of the parties . . .”

255 I therefore conclude that the correct test for a penalty is whether the sum or remedy stipulated as a consequence of a breach of contract is exorbitant or unconscionable when regard is had to the innocent party’s interest in the performance of the contract. Where the test is to be applied to a clause fixing the level of damages to be paid on breach, an extravagant disproportion between the stipulated sum and the highest level of damages that could possibly arise from the breach would amount to a penalty and thus be unenforceable. In other circumstances the contractual provision that applies on breach is measured against the interest of the innocent party which is protected by the contract and the court asks whether the remedy is exorbitant or unconscionable.

Whether the rule against penalties should be abrogated or altered?

256 I am not persuaded that there is any proper basis for abrogating the rule against penalties or restricting its application to commercial transactions where the parties are unequal in their bargaining power and there is a risk of oppression.

257 The rule against penalties is an exception to the general approach of the common law that parties are free to contract as they please and that the courts will enforce their agreements—pacta sunt servanda. The rule against penalties may have been motivated in part by a desire to prevent oppression of the weaker party by the more powerful party to a contractual negotiation. As I have said, Viscount Stair spoke of this danger when he spoke of necessitous debtors having to yield to exorbitant penalties: IV.3.2. Diplock LJ in the Robophone case [1966] 1 WLR 1428, 1447A recognised the reality that many contracting parties could not contract à la carte but had to accept the table d’hôte of the standard term contract. In AMEV-UDC Finance Ltd v Austin (1986) 162 CLR 170, 193–194 Mason and Wilson JJ suggested that the rule was aimed at preventing oppression and that the nature of the relationship between the contracting parties was a factor relevant to unconscionableness. In Philips v Hong Kong (1993) 61 BLR 41, 58–59 Lord Woolf suggested that in some cases the fact that one of

A the contracting parties was able to dominate the other as to the choice of the contract terms was relevant to the application of the rule. But the application of the rule does not depend on any disparity of power of the contracting parties: Imperial Tobacco Co (of Great Britain and Ireland) Ltd v Parslay [1936] 2 All ER 515, 523, Lord Wright MR. Because the rule is not so limited, Ms Joanna Smith QC argued that the rule interferes with freedom of contract in circumstances in which it is not needed.

B 258 The rule may also be criticised because it can be circumvented by careful drafting. Indeed one of Cavendish's arguments was that clause 5.1 could have been removed from the scope of the rule if it had been worded so as to make the payment of the instalments conditional on performance of the clause 11 obligations. This is a consequence of the rule applying only in the context of breach of contract. But where it is clear that the parties have so circumvented the rule and that the substance of the contractual arrangement is the imposition of punishment for breach of contract, the concept of a disguised penalty may enable a court to intervene: see Interfoto Picture Library Ltd v Stiletto Visual Programmes Ltd [1989] QB 433, 445-446, Bingham LJ and, more directly, the American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Contracts, 2d (1981), section 356 on liquidated damages and penalties, in which the commentary suggests that the court's focus on the substance of the contractual term would enable it in an appropriate case to identify disguised penalties.

D 259 It may also be said against the rule that it promotes uncertainty in commercial dealings as the contracting parties may not be able to foresee the judges' value judgment on whether a particular provision is exorbitant or unconscionable. There is beyond doubt real benefit in parties being able to agree the consequences of a breach of contract, particularly where there would be difficulty in ascertaining the sum in damages which was appropriate to compensate the innocent party for loss caused by the breach. Parties save on transaction costs where they can avoid expensive litigation on the consequences of breach of contract. It has also been said that judges should be modest in their assumptions that they know about business: Wallis v Smith (1882) 21 Ch D 243, 266, Jessel MR.

E 260 Legislative measures have been introduced to control unfair terms in contracts. In recent years, the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 and the Consumer Protection from Unfair Trading Regulations 2008 have given effect to European Directives and more recently the Consumer Rights Act 2015 has been brought into force. But while this legislation may have reduced the need for the rule against penalties in consumer contracts, it has no bearing on commercial contracts.

F 261 There are therefore arguments that can be made against the rule against penalties, or at least against its scope. But I am persuaded that the rule against penalties should remain part of our law, principally for three reasons.

G 262 First, there remain significant imbalances in negotiating power in the commercial world. Small businesses often contract with large commercial entities and have little say as to the terms of their contracts. Examples such as the relationship between a main contractor and a sub-contractor in the construction industry and that between a large retail chain and a small supplier spring to mind.

263 Secondly, abolition of the rule against penalties would go against the flow of legal developments both nationally and internationally. Both the Law Commission of England and Wales and the Scottish Law Commission have looked at the rule against penalties and neither has recommended its abolition. The Law Commission's Working Paper No 61 on Penalty Clauses and Forfeiture of Money Paid (1975) proposed the extension of judicial control to embrace penalty clauses that come into operation without any breach of contract. More recently, the Scottish Law Commission's Report on Penalty Clauses (1999) recommended the retention of judicial control over penalties whether they took the form of a payment of money, a forfeiture of money, a transfer of property or a forfeiture of property. It recommended a criterion of "manifestly excessive" and the abolition of any requirement that the clause be founded in a pre-estimate of damages. It also recommended that judicial control should not be confined to cases where the promisor is in breach of contract.

264 As counsel's very helpful researches showed, other common law countries such as Australia, Canada, New Zealand, Singapore and Hong Kong have rules against penalties, as has the commercially important law of New York, the Uniform Commercial Code and, as I have mentioned, the American Law Institute, Restatement of the Law, Contracts, 2d.

265 In the civil law tradition, which has had a profound influence on Scots law and which under Lord Mansfield influenced the development of English commercial law, the modern civil codes of Belgium (article 1231), France (article 1152), Germany (section 343), and Italy (article 1384) and the Swiss Code of Obligations (article 163) all provide for the modification of contractual penalties using tests such as "manifestly excessive", "disproportionately high", or "excessive". Further, in what Mr Bloch described as "soft law", recent international instruments prepared by expert lawyers, such as the Council of Europe's Resolution (78) 3 on Penal Clauses in Civil Law (1978) (article 7), the Principles of European Contract Law (1998) (article 9:509), the UNIDROIT Principles of International Commercial Contracts (1994) (article 7.4.13) and UNCITRAL Uniform Rules on Contract Clauses for an Agreed Sum Due upon Failure of Performance (1983) (article 8) also provide for the restriction of "grossly excessive" or "manifestly excessive" or "substantially disproportionate" penalty clauses. The Draft Common Frame of Reference: Principles, Definitions and Model Rules of European Private Law (2009) also provides for the reduction of stipulated payments for non-performance if they are "grossly excessive": p 253, III-3:712.

266 Thirdly, I am not persuaded that the rule against penalties prevents parties from reaching sensible arrangements to fix the consequences of a breach of contract and thus avoid expensive disputes. The criterion of exorbitance or unconscionableness should prevent the enforcement of only egregious contractual provisions.

267 Ms Smith's alternative proposal, that the rule should not extend to commercial transactions in which the parties are of equal bargaining power and each acts on skilled legal advice, does not appeal to me. Creating such a gateway to the application of the rule would risk adding to the expense of commercial disputes by requiring the court to rule on issues of fact about the bargaining power of the parties and the calibre of their respective legal advisers.

A 268 I therefore turn to the application of the rule against penalties in the two appeals.

The application of the rule against penalties:

(a) In the Cavendish appeal

B 269 Clause 5.1, which removes a seller's valuable rights to receive the interim payment and final payment if he is in breach of clause 11.2, was likely to deprive the defaulting shareholder of a substantial sum of money. The parties have agreed that the enforcement of the clause would deprive Mr Makdessi of up to $44,181,600. Breach of clause 11.2 therefore comes at a high price.

C 270 There is clearly a strong argument, which Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC favour, that in substance clause 5.1 is a primary obligation which made payment of the interim and final payments conditional on the seller's performance of his clause 11.2 obligations. But even if it were correct to analyse clause 5.1 as a secondary provision operating on breach of the seller's primary obligation, I am satisfied that it is not an unenforceable penalty clause for the following six reasons.

D 271 First, it is important to consider the nature of the obligations of the sellers which could trigger the withholding of the instalments under clause 5.1. Clause 11.2 imposed restrictive covenants on the sellers, prohibiting them from competing with the company. Having sold substantial blocks of shares in the company for a price which attributed a high value to its goodwill, the sellers were prohibited from derogating from what they had sold.

E 272 Secondly, the factual matrix in the uncontested evidence of Mr Andrew Scott, WPP's director of corporate development, and Mr Ghossoub and recorded in the agreed statement of facts and issues showed the importance of personal relationships in the marketing sector and particularly in the Middle East. The statement of facts and issues recorded (at para 5) that the success of the group's business depended on the personal relationships which Mr Ghossoub and Mr Makdessi had built up with their key clients and in para 33, which Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC quote at para 66 of their judgment, it explained that the agreement was structured to protect the goodwill of the group. The continued loyalty of the sellers was critically important to preserving the value of the group's goodwill.

F 273 Thirdly, that evidence and the agreement itself showed that a large proportion of the agreed purchase price was attributable to that goodwill. Extrapolating from the maximum consideration which the sellers could have received for the shares which they sold, the company had a maximum value of $300m which compares with its certified NAV (without goodwill) of $69.7m.

G 274 Cavendish therefore needed to be assured of the sellers' loyalty. It had a very substantial and legitimate interest in protecting the value of the company's goodwill. It did so by giving the sellers a strong financial incentive to remain loyal to the company by complying with the restrictions set out in clause 11.2. The sellers, who, like Cavendish, had access to expert legal advice and negotiated the contract over several months, agreed to peril their entitlement to the deferred consideration on their continued loyalty. A

275 Fourthly, I am not persuaded by Mr Bloch's argument that clause 5.1 was exorbitant because it could be triggered by a minor breach of clause 11.2, such as an unsuccessful solicitation of a senior employee. That appears to me to be unrealistic. Clause 5.1 was not addressing the loss which Cavendish might suffer from breach of the restrictive covenant, whether an isolated and minor breach or repeated and fundamental breaches. It was addressing the disloyalty of a seller who was prepared in any way to attack the company's goodwill. No question therefore arises of a presumption of a penalty where the same sum is payable on the occurrence of several events which may cause serious or trifling damages as in Lord Dunedin's proposition 4(c) in the Dunlop case [1915] AC 79. In any event, that presumption would not apply because the losses arising from any breach of clause 11.2 were generically the same: see Lord Parker of Waddington in Dunlop, at p 98. As Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC have said at para 75, loyalty is indivisible. B C

276 Fifthly, Mr Bloch submitted that clause 5.1 might operate perversely as far as Mr Makdessi was concerned because a minor breach of clause 11.2, which did not harm the company's goodwill, would result in his losing more by the loss of the interim and final payments than a major breach which diminished the profits of the company and thus the deferred consideration. Similarly, he submitted that a breach that was detected before the interim payment or the final payment would have more serious consequences for the seller than one detected later. But again clause 5.1 is not addressing the loss which Cavendish may incur from a particular breach. The relevant questions are broader, namely (i) whether Cavendish had a legitimate interest in the circumstances to protect its investment in the company and (ii) whether the making of its later instalments of price depend on each seller's performance of his clause 11.2 obligations was a manifestly excessive means of protecting that interest. D E

277 Finally, I am not persuaded that the company's entitlement to seek a disgorgement of Mr Makdessi's profits arising from his breach of fiduciary duty and the possibility that Cavendish itself might have a claim in damages if Mr Makdessi breached clause 11.2 after he ceased to be a director make the operation of clause 5.1 exorbitant or unconscionable. The former is res inter alios acta as each of Cavendish and the company have separate legal personality. Any award of damages to Cavendish would be designed to place it in the same position financially as if the contract had been performed. If an award of damages together with the price reduction which clause 5.1 effects involved double counting, I would expect the price reduction to be credited against the claim for damages. F G

278 In summary, I am persuaded that in the circumstances of this share purchase, Cavendish had a very substantial legitimate interest to protect by making the deferred consideration depend on the continued loyalty of the sellers through their compliance with the prohibitions in clause 11.2. I do not construe clause 5.1 as a stipulation for punishment for breach; it is neither exorbitant nor unconscionable but is commensurate with Cavendish's legitimate interests. It may therefore be enforced. H

279 Clause 5.6, which provides for the compulsory transfer of the defaulting shareholder's retained shareholding, is more difficult. But I have

A come to the view that it also may be enforced. Mr Makdessi does not contest the obligation placed on the defaulting shareholder to transfer his shares on breach of contract. But he challenges the price at which the compulsory transfer is to be effected, as the formula for the calculation of the price excludes the value of goodwill.

B 280 There is again a strong argument, which Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC favour, that clause 5.6 is a primary obligation to which the rule against penalties does not apply. But if all such clauses were treated as primary obligations, there would be considerable scope for abuse. I construe the clause as a secondary obligation, which is designed to deter (a) the sellers from breaching their clause 11.2 obligations and (b) a seller who is an employee from misconduct which damages the interests of the group and leads to summary dismissal (viz the Schedule 12 definition of “defaulting shareholder”).

C 281 Clause 5.6, like clause 5.1, is not a provision which fixes the damages payable for a breach of contract. It seeks to regulate the terms on which a defaulting shareholder severs his connection with the company. It falls to be construed in the context of the agreement as a whole, in which Cavendish agreed to pay a price for the shares which it purchased on the basis that the sellers remained involved in the company for transitional periods and complied with their clause 11.2 duties for at least two years after they had exercised their put options under clause 15 or had otherwise ceased to hold shares in the company. I think that Mr Makdessi was correct in accepting that, if a seller acted in breach of clause 11.2 by competing with the company in any of the ways listed in that clause, Cavendish would act reasonably in seeking to remove him from any involvement in the company, including by the compulsory transfer of his shareholding. On the departure of the defaulting shareholder, the company would lose both his work on its behalf and also his valuable personal connections. It was readily foreseeable at the time of contracting that the departure on default of either of the sellers would cause significant damage to the company’s goodwill and thus materially reduce its value.

D 282 Against that background, the question for the court is whether the defaulting shareholder option price, which was the net asset value of the company excluding any goodwill value, was an exorbitant or unconscionable undervaluation when measured against Cavendish’s legitimate interest in protecting its investment from the risk of either of the sellers acting against the company’s interests. In my view, the terms were harsh; but they were not exorbitant. They were not a punishment but, in the particular context of the purchase of a marketing business in the Middle East, were a legitimate means of encouraging the sellers to comply with their clause 11.2 obligations which were critical to Cavendish’s investment. Nor were the terms unconscionable for any broader reason. The contract was negotiated in detail by parties of relatively equal bargaining power and with skilled legal advice; a seller could readily comply with the obligations in clause 11.2, which were, in Lord Neaves’s words in the Forrest & Barr case 8 M 187 (see para 249 above), obligations in non faciendo, or prohibitions.

E 283 For completeness, I comment on Mr Bloch’s suggestion that the court has a power to modify the terms on which clause 5.6 would operate. In English law a penalty clause cannot be enforced. For the reasons given by Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC in their judgment at paras 84–87, I think that the decision of the Court of Appeal in Jobson v Johnston [1989] 1 WLR 1026 was incorrect in so far as it modified a penalty clause and should be overruled. In Scots law the statutory power of the court to modify a penalty (see para 252 above) does not extend to a penalty in support of a primary obligation other than for payment of a sum of money. If there is in Scots law a residual common law power of modification of penalties in support of primary obligations such as to supply goods or services as in Craig v M'Beath 1 M 1020, I do not see how the power of abatement can extend to modifying the price of a compulsorily transferred asset.

(b) In Mr Beavis's appeal

284 I agree (a) that the relationship between ParkingEye and Mr Beavis was a contractual relationship in the form of a licence and (b) that the parking charge incurred on breach of the obligation to park for no more than two hours engages the rule against penalties. If my analysis of the rule against penalties is correct, the only relevant questions are (i) did ParkingEye have a legitimate interest to protect by the imposition of the parking charge; (ii) whether the level of the charge is exorbitant or unconscionable.

285 This is because, first, the charge was not and did not purport to be a claim for damages for any loss that ParkingEye would suffer as a result of a motorist exceeding the two-hour maximum parking time. ParkingEye suffered no loss. Secondly, the fact that the charge encouraged the motorist to comply with the terms of the licence and deterred him or her from overstaying or parking irresponsibly outside the marked parking bays did not make it a penalty. Deterrence in that sense is not the test for a penalty.

286 ParkingEye had a legitimate interest to protect. It provided a service to its clients, the owners of the retail park which leased units to retailers. It undertook to manage the car park in a way which benefitted the owners and the retailers and also the public seeking to visit units within the retail park by encouraging the public to remain in the car park for no longer than two hours. ParkingEye imposed the parking charge in order to encourage the prompt turnover of car parking spaces and also to fund its own business activities and make a profit.

287 That legitimate interest would not justify the parking charge if it were out of all proportion to that interest, or, in other words, exorbitant. In deciding whether the charge was exorbitant, I think that the court can look at the statutorily authorised practice of local authorities in England and Wales and also the recommendations of the accredited trade association, the BPA. Neither is conclusive and the question is ultimately a value judgment by the court. But local authority practice, the BPA guidance, and also the evidence that it is common practice in the United Kingdom to allow motorists to stay for two hours in such private car parks and then to impose a charge of £85, support the view that such a charge was not manifestly excessive. There was no other evidence that suggested otherwise. In so far as the criterion of unconscionableness allows the court to address considerations other than the size of the penalty in relation to the protected interest, the fact that motorists entering the car park were given ample warning of both the time limit of their licence and the amount of the charge also supports the view that the parking charge was not unconscionable.

A 288 I therefore conclude that the rule against penalties is no bar against the enforcement of the parking charge imposed on Mr Beavis.

Mr Beavis's other ground of appeal: the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999

B 289 I was initially in some doubt about the correct answer to this challenge. But on further consideration I am persuaded for the reasons given by Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC and also by Lord Mance JSC that the £85 charge did not infringe the 1999 Regulations.

Conclusion

C 290 I would therefore allow the appeal in Cavendish v Makdessi and dismiss the appeal in ParkingEye v Beavis and make the declarations that Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption JSC propose in para 115 of their joint judgment.

LORD CLARKE OF STONE-CUM-EBONY JSC

D 291 I agree that the appeal in Cavendish should be allowed, that that in Beavis should be dismissed and that we should make the declarations proposed by Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC. In reaching those conclusions I agree with the reasoning of Lord Neuberger PSC and Lord Sumption, Lord Mance and Lord Hodge JSC, save that on the question whether clauses 5.1 and 5.6 are capable of constituting penalties, I agree with Lord Hodge JSC in having an open mind about clause 5.1, and in concluding that clause 5.6 is a secondary obligation: see paras 270 and 280 respectively. As to the relationship between penalties and forfeiture, my present inclination is to agree with Lord Hodge JSC (in para 227) and with Lord Mance JSC (in paras 160–161) that in an appropriate case the court should ask first whether, as a matter of construction, the clause is a penalty and, if it answers that question in the negative, it should ask (where relevant) whether relief against forfeiture should be granted in equity having regard to the position of each of the parties after the breach.

LORD TOULSON JSC (dissenting in part on ParkingEye Ltd)

G 292 I agree with paras 116–187 of the judgment of Lord Mance JSC and paras 216–283 of the judgment of Lord Hodge JSC. In short, I agree with them on all points of general principle about the doctrine of penalties, its inter-relationship with forfeiture and the application of the principles in the Cavendish case.

293 On the essential nature of a penalty clause, I would highlight and endorse Lord Hodge JSC's succinct statement at para 255 that

H “the correct test for a penalty is whether the sum or remedy stipulated as a consequence of a breach of contract is exorbitant or unconscionable when regard is had to the innocent party's interest in the performance of the contract.”

Parties and courts should focus on that test, bearing in mind (a) that it is impossible to lay down abstract rules about what may or may not be “extravagant or unconscionable”, because it depends on the particular facts and circumstances established in the individual case (as the Earl of Halsbury LC said in Clydebank Engineering & Shipbuilding Co Ltd v Yzquierdo y Castaneda [1905] AC 6, 10, and Lord Parmoor said in Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co Ltd v New Garage and Motor Co Ltd [1915] AC 79, 101), and (b) that “extravagant or unconscionable” are strong words. I agree with Lord Mance JSC (para 152) that the word “unconscionable” in this context means much the same as “extravagant”.

294 On the inter-relationship between the law relating to penalties and forfeiture clauses, I agree specifically with paras 160–161 of Lord Mance JSC’s judgment and paras 227–230 of Lord Hodge JSC’s judgment. Ms Smith argued in her written case and orally that if relief were to be granted at all to Mr Makdessi it should be pursuant to the relief against forfeiture, because clauses such as 5.1 were properly to be regarded as forfeiture clauses and the penalty doctrine was therefore not capable of being applied. I would reject that argument for the reasons given by Lord Mance and Lord Hodge JJSC. I agree with them that the proper approach is to consider first whether the clause was an exorbitant provision to have included in the contract at the time when it was made; and, if not, to consider next whether any relief should properly be granted under the equitable doctrine of relief against forfeiture in the circumstances at and after the time of the breach. As Lord Mance and Lord Hodge JJSC have noted, this approach was followed by the Court of Appeal (Ackner, Kerr and Dillon LJ) in BICC plc v Bundy Corpn [1985] Ch 232. It is logical and just.

295 I disagree with the other members of the court in the parking case. Since I am a lone voice of dissent and the judgments are already exceedingly long, I will state my reasons briefly. Everyone agrees that there was a contract between Mr Beavis and ParkingEye, but I begin by looking at what was the consideration for, and essential content of, the contract. The parties were content to argue the case, as they had in the Court of Appeal, on the basis that by using the car park Mr Beavis entered into a contract by which he agreed to leave it within two hours; and that his failure to do so was a breach of contract for which he agreed to pay £85 (subject to a discount for prompt payment). Moore-Bick LJ expressed doubt whether this was the correct analysis, and since this is a test case it is right to consider the matter.

296 Where parties intend to enter into legal relations, it does not require much to constitute consideration. Some benefit must be conferred both ways; but the benefit provided by the promisor does not have to be for the promisee personally; it may be for some third party whom the promisee wishes to benefit. (This has nothing to do with the doctrine of privity.) Any act or promise in exchange for an act or promise can constitute consideration.

297 In this case we are concerned with a car park forming an integral part of a retail park occupied by a number of well known chains. The use of the car park was not merely a benefit to the user. It was of obvious benefit to the freeholder (and the lessees of the retail outlets) that members of the public should be attracted to the retail park by its availability, and that was no doubt why it was provided. As Mr Christopher Butcher QC correctly submitted, the use of the car park by Mr Beavis was sufficient consideration for a contract governing the terms of its usage. The form of notice stated that “Parking is at the absolute discretion of the site”, but once a motorist

A had parked he would obviously have to be given reasonable notice of a requirement to leave.

298 The most important term of the contract was that the user was permitted to stay for a maximum of two hours. That requirement was displayed in bigger and bolder letters than anything else. There were subsidiary requirements; that the user should not return within one hour after leaving; that parking should be within the bays marked; and that certain bays were restricted to use by blue badge holders (ie persons with mobility problems). The contract further stated, although this was not legally necessary, that “By parking within the car park, motorists agree to comply with the car park regulations”, meaning the provisions stated in the notice (since there were no other regulations). Overstaying would therefore be a breach of contract (as, for example, would be parking except within the lines of an appropriate marked bay). In the case of a breach of any description, the user agree to pay the sum of £85. This was therefore, as the parties rightly accepted, an agreement to pay a specified figure for a breach of contract. It was not an agreement allowing a motorist to overstay in consideration of a payment of £85. On overstaying (or for that matter on returning within one hour after leaving the car park) the user would be a trespasser. We are not concerned in this case whether the agreement to pay £85 would leave the landowner free to sue the user for damages for trespass, although he would no doubt in theory be entitled to seek injunctive relief.

299 It is convenient to consider the effect of the Unfair Terms in Consumer Contracts Regulations 1999 (“the Regulations”) before considering the effect of the common law on penalty clauses. Regulation 8(1) provides that an unfair term in a contract concluded with a consumer by a seller or supplier shall not be binding on the consumer. An unfair term is defined in regulation 5(1):

300 Regulation 6(1) requires the question of unfairness to be assessed, taking into account the nature of the goods or services, and by referring to all the circumstances at the time of the conclusion of the contract and to all the other terms of the contract.

301 Regulation 6(2) excludes from the assessment of fairness terms (provided that they are in plain intelligible language) relating to the definition of the main subject matter of the contract or to the adequacy of the price or remuneration, as against the goods or services supplied in exchange. The term which levies £85 on a user of the car park who overstays, or returns within an hour or parks badly, does not provide remuneration for the services of ParkingEye, nor does it relate to the definition of the subject matter of the contract. It is simply a penalty for doing one of the things prohibited. Its enforceability depends on whether it satisfies the requirement of fairness within the meaning of the Regulations.

302 Schedule 2 to the Regulations provides an indicative list of terms which may be considered unfair, including a term requiring a consumer who fails to fulfil his obligation to pay a disproportionately high sum in compensation.

303 The Regulations give effect to the European Council Directive 93/13/EEC of 5 April 1993 on unfair terms in consumer contracts (“the Directive”). Article 3(1) of the Directive is the counterpart to regulation 5(1) and is identically worded. A

304 In Director General of Fair Trading v First National Bank plc [2002] 1 AC 481, para 17, Lord Bingham of Cornhill described this provision as laying down a composite test, covering both the making and the substance of the contract, which must be applied bearing in mind the object which the Regulations are designed to promote. He said that fair dealing requires that the supplier should not, deliberately or unconsciously, take advantage of the consumer’s necessity, indigence, lack of experience, unfamiliarity with the subject matter of the contract, weak bargaining position or any factor listed in or analogous to those listed in the Schedule. B

305 In the same case Lord Millett, at para 54, suggested as a matter for consideration whether, as between parties negotiating freely a contract on level terms, the party adversely affected by the term “or his lawyer” might reasonably be expected to object to it. C

306 More recently in Aziz v Caixa d’Estalvis de Catalunya, Tarragona i Manresa (Catalunyacaixa) (Case C-415/11) [2013] All ER (EC) 770 the Court of Justice of the European Union has addressed the interpretation of article 3(1) of the Directive. It observed, at para 44, that the system of protection introduced by the Directive is based on the idea that the consumer is in a weak position vis-à-vis the seller or supplier. D

307 In agreement with the opinion of Advocate General Kokott, the court held that the reference in article 3(1) to a “significant imbalance” in the parties’ rights and obligations under the contract must be interpreted as requiring the court to evaluate to what extent the term places the consumer in a worse position than would have been the situation under the relevant national law in the absence of that term. Applying that test, it follows that the £85 penalty clause created a significant imbalance within the meaning of the Regulation, because it far exceeded any amount which was otherwise likely to be recoverable as damages for breach of contract or trespass. E

308 As to whether the imbalance was contrary to the requirement of good faith, the court, at para 76, in agreement with the Advocate General held that: F

“in order to assess whether the imbalance arises ‘contrary to the requirement of good faith’, it must be determined whether the seller or supplier, dealing fairly and equitably with the consumer, could reasonably assume that the consumer would have agreed to the term concerned in individual contract negotiations.” G

309 That test is significantly more favourable to the consumer than would be applied by a court in this country under the penalty doctrine. Whereas the starting point at common law is that parties should be kept to their bargains, and it is for those objecting that a clause is penal to establish its exorbitant nature, the starting point of the Directive is that the consumer needs special protection, and it is for the supplier to show that a non-core term which is significantly disadvantageous to the consumer, as compared with the ordinary operation of the law without that term, is one which the supplier can fairly assume that the consumer would have agreed in H

A individual negotiations on level terms. The burden is on the supplier to adduce the evidence necessary to justify that conclusion.

B 310 I do not consider that such an assumption could fairly be made in the present case. The Consumers' Association through Mr Butcher advanced a number of telling points. By most people's standards £85 is a substantial sum of money. Mr Butcher reminded the court by way of comparison that the basic state pension is £115 per week. There may be many reasons why the user of a car park in a retail park may unintentionally overstay by a short period. There may be congestion in the shops or the user may be held up for any number of reasons. There may be congestion trying to get out of the car park. In short there may be numerous unforeseen circumstances. No allowance is made for disabilities (other than the provision of bays for blue badge holders). Similarly there may be good reasons for a person to return to the car park within two hours, for example because the shopper has left something behind (and the car park may incidentally be half empty). There may be reasons why a user parks with his wheels outside the marked bay (for example because of the way the adjacent vehicle is parked or because he is a wheelchair user and none of the blue bays are available). Examples could be multiplied. The point is that the penalty clause makes no allowance for circumstances, allows no period of grace and provides no room for adjustment.

D 311 The court was referred to a code of practice published by the British Parking Association which addresses some of these matters, but the significant fact is that it is not a contractual document. A competent lawyer representing a user in individual negotiation might be expected, among other things, to argue that the supplier should at least commit to following the code of practice.

E 312 More broadly the penalty clause places the whole cost of running the car park on the shoulders of those who overstay by possibly a very short time, although their contribution to the cost will have been very small. The trial judge and the Court of Appeal were impressed by a comparison with the charges at local authority car parks. The comparison is seductive but superficial. Apart from the fact that local authorities operate under a different statutory scheme, a large amount of the cost is raised from all users by hourly charges, as distinct from placing the entire burden on the minority of overstayers; and there is not the same feature in the case of a municipal car park as there is in a supermarket car park, where the car park is ancillary to the use of the retail units some of whose customers are then required to underwrite the entire cost as a result of overstaying.

F 313 There is of course an artificiality in postulating a hypothetical negotiation between the supplier and an individual customer with the same access to legal advice, but because it is a consumer contract, and because the supplier is inserting a term which alters the legal effect under the core terms in the supplier's favour, the supplier requires as it were to put itself in the customer's shoes and consider whether it "can reasonably assume that the customer would have agreed" to it.

G 314 I am not persuaded that it would be reasonable to make that assumption in this case and I would therefore have allowed the appeal. It has been suggested that managing the effective use of parking space in the interests of the retailer and the users of those outlets who wished to find spaces to park could only work by deterring people from occupying space for a long time. But that is a guess. It may be so; it may not. ParkingEye called no evidence on the point. But it is common knowledge that many supermarket car parks make no such charge. I return to the point that it was for ParkingEye to show the factual grounds on which it could reasonably assume that a customer using that car park would have agreed, in individual negotiations, to pay £85 if he overstayed for a minute, or parked with his wheels not entirely within a marked bay, or for whatever reason returned to the car park in less than one hour (perhaps because he had left something behind). On the bare information which was placed before the court, I am not persuaded that ParkingEye has shown grounds for assuming that a party who was in a position to bargain individually, and who was advised by a competent lawyer, would have agreed to the penalty clause as it stood.

315 Lord Neuberger of Abbotsbury PSC and Lord Sumption JSC in para 107 have substituted their judgment of reasonableness of the clause for the question whether the supplier could reasonably have assumed that the customer would have agreed with the term, and on that approach there is not much, if any, difference in substance from the test whether it offended the penalty doctrine at common law. That approach is consistent with their statement in para 104 that the considerations which show that it is not a penalty demonstrate also that it does not offend the Regulations. I consider that the approach waters down the test adopted by the CJEU and at the very least that the point is not acte clair.

316 Mr Beavis's argument that the clause was a penalty at common law is more questionable, but in the circumstances nothing would be gained by discussing that matter further.

Appeal in first case allowed.
Appeal in second case dismissed.
